Observe, while admitting that the good of the service requires it, while admitting these were routes appropriated for and that he had got all the money he asked to maintain them, he tells us that he has cut down thousands of routes which the good of the service required should be kept up as daily mails, and by his order of the 20th of February reduced them all from daily to weekly, in order to keep himself technically within what he calls the law!

Senator BECK. And you have brought about that condition of things by increasing the service on routes elsewhere beyond the appropriations which Congress gave you, which were all that you asked them for? Is not that the fact also?

Mr. KEY. The sum appropriated was all that we asked for; but I want to say that I think all parts of the country are entitled to the same character of service under like circumstances; and if a place like Leadville grows up in the interval between appropriations, it is entitled to service. If it is entitled to a mail I must give it its share of mail facilities, although I have for that reason to reduce the service on some old route. That is all I have to say.

Senator BECK. My examination has no personal bearing; it is with a view of testing the question between Congress and the Departments, as to whether we have any power in Congress to control executive officers, or whether they can by creating deficiencies make us appropriate whatever they want; and, believing that you were acting in clear violation of law, I intend to make that question. That is the whole case.

Mr. KEY. I want to say here that I expect to comply with that law which you have read.

Senator BECK. I think you have violated that law in letter and spirit.

That closed the examination on that point so far as I was concerned; it was because I determined to make the question that I insisted upon the preamble now in this bill. I have no personal quarrel with the Postmaster-General; I believe he is a man of high personal integrity. I will say that for him as being my conscientious conviction; but I insist that he, being the responsible head of the Department, perhaps more in name than in fact, has wantonly violated the law; he has created deficiencies in plain violation of it; that he is not doing it accidentally. If he was doing it by accident or mistake I would not care so much to have the question of right and power between him and Congress settled. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General avowed the same thing, and he testified that he had expended $3,800,000 in the first six months, in a carefully prepared written statement, $400,000 more than the Senator from Texas thought they had expended, and he claimed that they had only $2,100,000 for the next six months. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General says:

The necessity for speedy action upon the part of Congress is apparent. The Department especially desires it in order that its action may be made strictly to conform to the wishes of Congress.

There is no deficiency. None will be created. The action of the Department has been thus far in strict conformity with the law, and will continue to be. If not deemed wise on the part of Congress to increase the appropriation as asked, the Department will, of necessity, curtail mail facilities so as to bring the same within the cost of the original appropriation. To necessitate this course would work incalculable injury and great injustice. The course pursued thus far by the Department was adopted after mature consideration, and has been steadily adhered to, because it was deemed wise and just.

Therefore it is evident that they did not exceed the appropriation by accident; they did it by design. The course pursued by the Department was adopted "after mature consideration, and has been steadily adhered to," and he admits that the course it necessitated them to pursue in stopping the mails "would work incalculable injury and great injustice." What remains? Congress must give them the money or "incalculable injury and great injustice" will be done. I agree to that; we are powerless; we are not a deliberative body. Who caused that great injustice to be done? Who put the Department in such a shape as to work that incalculable injury? It was the Post-Office Department, by wrongfully expending the money in the early part of the year that was given them by Congress on their own application for the whole service during the entire year; and now they tell the country "Congress has stopped your mails; Congress refuses to give us money to enable us to carry your mails."

We are under duress; we are coerced by the executive officers of this Department. It is as if "road agents" ordered us to hold up our hands or "stand and deliver;" we have to let all the mails be stopped or we have to furnish the money the officials demand. Is Congress a deliberative body in passing on this question? Is Congress in a position to give or refuse to give, as it pleases? Ought Congress to be put in that position? Ought Congress to be required to legislate in this way? Is it legislation when 10,400 of the great mail routes of the country are to be stopped by executive order? Unless we give the Post-Office officials all the money they demand, we are told that a course has been taken, after mature deliberation, which will work incalculable injury; and yet we are told by the Postmaster-General that he is still within the law and is maintaining it in letter and spirit; and the chairman of the Post-Office Committee defends him and says that is right.

Mr. MAXEY. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will allow me a moment.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. The argument of the Senator from Kentucky as I understand it is that the Postmaster-General is a man of integrity but indiscreet, and therefore the public service should suffer. That is the logical conclusion. I wish to say now that I understand during my temporary absence the Senator from Kentucky was criticising my argument and I understood the Senator from Delaware, as a member of the Post-Office Committee, rose to say that I was not speaking on behalf of the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Kentucky was commenting on the remarks of the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, and then said the Post-Office Committee, or words to that purport, were ready and willing to come in and indorse all the applications made by the Post-Office Department. I simply said to him that he was referring to the remarks of the chairman of the committee and not to the action of the committee.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not see how there could possibly be a misconception that I was speaking on behalf of the committee.

Mr. BECK. I at once said that I meant the chairman of the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. MAXEY. I referred to some historical facts in connection with General Rusk who once filled my seat in the Senate, who was chairman of the Post-Office Committee; but no remark I made shows that I spoke for the committee, but for myself. I expect to be responsible for every word I said.

Mr. BECK. I am not asking the Senator to take any of it back. I am endeavoring to show the Senator that he is just as palpably wrong as the Postmaster-General is, and that his construction of the law transfers all power over the moneys taken from the Treasury by appropriations to the discretion of the Postmaster-General or his Second Assistant, and away from the Congress of the United States where the law lodges it, and forces us either to do a greater evil than to give the money, to wit, to stop all the mails of the country, or to give him whatever he demands when he has seen fit to expend in six months what we are agreed to give him for twelve. I desire, and I will in the morning begin at this point, to show the reasons why these laws now found on the statute-book were passed. In 1870, when the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, we found the same condition of things existing. Great appropriations had been made during the war, of which heavy balances remained; large amounts of war materials were on hand, large numbers of useless ships were on hand; and the Departments were going on selling things, expending the money, and doing as they pleased without a re-appropriation. We took the matter in hand and we passed law after law which I propose to read in the morning to show that we were going to hold the purse-strings in our own hands, and that the Executive Departments must obey the laws we passed. And I must say that a republican Congress, largely republican in both branches, felt that it was its duty to place those restraints upon their executive officers and require them to come to Congress for authority to expend money and to keep within the appropriations made and to account for the money when they made sales of property, and we have saved millions and millions of dollars by holding them up to that responsibility, and this is the first time since that any Department has ever openly defied us.

They have frequently done wrong and sought indirectly to avoid the force of the laws; but this is the first time that we have been told defiantly that the Postmaster-General can spend all the money he likes in any portion of the year he pleases, and the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads maintains that that is the law. I propose to show that it is not the law, never was intended to be the law, never ought to be the law, and if the democratic party, now in power in both Houses for the first time in twenty years, is going to throw down all the barriers that have been erected in the last ten years and allow executive officers to override the law, spend what they please, and close our mails if we do not give them all they ask, we are making a bad start toward inaugurating reforms.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to state to the Senator from Kentucky that I argued upon the law as it stands. I did not intend to say that the law was just or wise. I did state that the Postmaster-General had declared it was not a wise law. I stated further that last June a bill had been introduced in the House for the purpose of correcting that law. It was submitted to the Post-Office Committee of the House, and a substitute which accomplished the object of correcting the evil alleged was introduced as late as the 16th day of December, and is still pending, for the very purpose of correcting that law. But as long as the law remains as it is the Postmaster-General is inside of the law.

Mr. BECK. We shall see how that is.

Mr. EATON. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, as there is a matter of some consequence there to be attended to.

Mr. BECK. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 15, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, beginning with the State of Alabama, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference, not to come back upon a motion to reconsider. Under this call joint and concurrent resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference. LIZZIE D. CLARKE.

Mr. ELLIS (by request) also introduced a bill for the relief of Lizzie D. Clarke, administratrix of the estate of James S. Clarke, deceased; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask that that be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. CONGER. That should go to the Committee on War Claims. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Michigan moves to amend, and asks its reference to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. ELLIS. I introduced this bill by request, having just received it as I came to my seat. I have not examined it, and I would ask that the memorial accompanying it be read.

The SPEAKER. It is not usual to read memorials accompanying bills under this call.

Mr. CONGER. The bill itself relates to the subject of war claims and to that only, and it should go to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The memorial accompanying the bill can go into the petition-box, and be referred in that way to the committee to which the bill goes.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to have the memorial read, if there be no objection.

The SPEAKER. It is not usual to read memorials under the call of States. The gentleman can introduce it through the petition-box.

Mr. ELLIS. Then I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill for the present, in order to enable me to examine it and see whether it relates to the subject of war claims, as alleged by the gentleman from Michigan, or not.

There was no objection, and the bill was withdrawn.

HUGH M'GLINCEY.

Mr. ELLIS also (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5128) for the relief of Hugh McGlincey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ABRAM SELLERS.

Mr. ELLIS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5129) for the relief of Abram Sellers, administrator de bonis non of James Le Caze.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. ELLIS. I can tell the gentleman from Michigan that this bill arises out of a claim for money loaned to the old Confederation during the revolutionary war.

Mr. CONGER. Does it raise a legal question in the consideration of it?

Mr. ELLIS. It does raise a law question.

Mr. CONGER. If that be the character of the claim, then I have no objection to its reference as requested.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ACKLEN introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 241) to amend the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

OPENING AND DREDGING OF RED RIVER.

Mr. ROBERTSON also presented joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, asking an appropriation for the opening and dredging of the mouth of the Red River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF CALCASIEU RIVER, LOUISIANA.

Mr. ROBERTSON also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana asking an appropriation for dredging and removing obstructions to navigation at the mouth of the Calcasieu River.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose these go properly into the box, these resolutions for the improvement of rivers?

The SPEAKER. These are joint resolutions of a State Legislature.

Mr. CONGER. Well, I am so glad to see the Southern States wheeling into line on the subject of internal improvements.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I have not said it was. I was simply making a remark why I did not insist upon having these referred through the petition-box.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman from Michigan make?

Mr. CONGER. I have made no motion.

Mr. ROBERTSON. In advocating the improvement of rivers and harbors we are carrying out the views expressed by General Jackson in his message vetoing the Maysville road bill, in which he declared he was in favor of internal improvements when they were general, not local; national, not State.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GIBSON. I present concurrent resolutions of the General Assembly of Louisiana, relative to the improvement of the Calcasieu River, and ask that the resolutions be read.

The concurrent resolutions were read, and were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CURTIS S. THOMSON.

MEMPHIS AND LITTLE ROCK RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. FARR introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5143) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and adjust the account between the United States and the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company on account of customs duties arising out of importation of iron for said company during the years 1860 and 1861; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT RIGHTS.

Mr. BLAKE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5144) in relation to suits or actions for infringement of patent rights; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

DISCHARGE OF SEAMEN BY CONSULAR OFFICERS.

Mr. ROSS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5145) to amend chapter 5, title 53, of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. What is the subject of that bill?

The SPEAKER. It will be read.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The bill relates to the discharge of seamen by consular officers.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE M. CHESTER.

Mr. ROBESON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5146) to increase the pension of George M. Chester, late sergeant Company G, Twenty-fourth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, to $24 per month from January 1, 1870; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES MORROW.

Mr. LADD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives of the United States to the Sergeant-at-Arms thereof the sum of $500, or so much as may be necessary thereof, to pay the funeral and other expenses contracted by the sickness and death of James Morrow, late foreman of the folding-room of this House; and there shall also be paid, out of the contingent fund of this House, six months' pay from March 15, 1880, to Jane Morrow, widow of deceased. Both sums appropriated by this resolution shall be subject to the Committee on Accounts.

CHARLES H. MASLY.

Mr. SLEMONS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5241) for the relief of Charles H. Masly, late a second lieutenant in Company K, Forty-seventh Kentucky Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' GRAVES, MONTICELLO, ARKANSAS.

Mr. SLEMONS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5242) making an appropriation for inclosing the graves of Federal soldiers at the town of Monticello, Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WORKINGMEN OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MURCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 245) providing for the speedy payment of the workingmen of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read Rule XXVIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session.

2. All motions to suspend the rules shall, before being submitted to the House, be seconded by a majority by tellers, if demanded.

3. When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded, it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken thereon, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition, and the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

SINKING FUND PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished motion to suspend the rules, coming over from a former Monday, is the motion made by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE,] chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, under instruction from that committee, and the Chair is advised that gentleman is sick in bed and unable to attend, and that he requests his motion may be allowed to go over to the third Monday of the next month.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I move that be allowed.

Mr. CONGER. What is that bill?

The SPEAKER. It is in relation to the investment of the sinking fund in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, concerning Pacific Railroad bonds.

INDIVIDUAL SUSPENSIONS.

Mr. WEAVER. These rules were adopted after the first Monday of this month, and hence individuals cannot be heard on motions to suspend the rules until the first Monday of next month.

The SPEAKER. The first Monday of next month individuals have preference over committees, and committees to-day being exhausted, individuals will then be recognized.

MACON A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5243) to constitute Macon, in the State of Georgia, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. I have reports to submit from the Committee on Commerce of resolutions calling for information, which were referred to our committee, and which, under the rule, have to be reported back within a week.

The SPEAKER. They can come in at any time; and the Chair will recognize the gentleman to-morrow for that purpose.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 2787) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes, with amendments in which concurrence was requested.

WILLIAM H. MINER.

Mr. URNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5244) for the relief of William H. Miner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ERASTUS CRIPPEN.

Mr. URNER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5245) granting a pension to Erastus Crippen, late private of Company G, One hundred and forty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARGARET KLINEDINST.

Mr. BELTZHOVER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5246) granting a pension to Margaret Klinedinst, late a private of Company A, Sixteenth Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARY CRAMER.

Mr. BELTZHOVER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5247) granting a pension to Mary Cramer, widow of George Cramer, late a private Company A, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. DUNN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to move to suspend the rules for the purpose of discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1846) relating to the public lands of the United States and bring it before the House for consideration. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That when any lands of the United States shall have been entered, and the Government price paid therefor in full, no suit or proceeding, civil or criminal, by or in the name of the United States, shall thereafter be had or further maintained for any trespasses upon, or for or on account of any material taken from, said lands, or on account of any alleged conspiracy in relation thereto, prior to the approval of this act: Provided, The defendants in such suits or proceedings begun before such full payment shall exhibit to the proper court or officer the evidence of such entry and payment, and shall pay all costs accrued up to the time of such payment.

SEC. 2. That persons who have heretofore under any of the homestead laws entered lands properly subject to such entry, or persons to whom the rights of those having so entered for homesteads, may have been attempted to be transferred by bona fide instrument in writing, may entitle themselves to said lands by paying therefor $1.25 per acre, and the amount heretofore paid the Government upon said lands shall be taken as part payment of said price: Provided, This shall in no wise interfere with the rights or claims of others who may have subsequently entered such lands under the homestead laws.

SEC. 3. That the price of lands now subject to entry which were raised to $2.50 per acre more than twenty years prior to the passage of this act by reason of the grant of alternate sections for railroad purposes is hereby reduced to $1.25.

SEC. 4. This act shall not apply to any of the mineral lands of the United States; and no person who shall be prosecuted for or proceeded against on account of any trespasses committed or material taken from any of the public lands after the passage of this act shall be entitled to the benefit thereof.

The SPEAKER. By the second clause of Rule XXVIII all motions to suspend the rules, before being submitted to the House, must be seconded by a majority by tellers, if demanded.

Mr. CONGER. Has notice been given in this case as required by the rules?

The SPEAKER. There has been notice in this case given to the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. Has there been any in the House?

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules requiring one day's notice.

Mr. CONGER. The rule provides that no standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor.

The SPEAKER. And the rule then goes on to say no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present. This is a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is not a motion to rescind or change, but a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. If this motion to suspend the rules be carried by a two-thirds vote it will suspend the rule to which the gentleman from Michigan refers.

Mr. CONGER. Does it change the rule that bills making appropriation of land or money shall have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. A two-thirds vote suspends all the rules.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the requirement of notice was positive not to take members unaware.

The SPEAKER. If this be carried by a two-thirds vote, it will suspend all the rules for the purpose indicated. Such has been the uniform ruling of the occupants of the chair, as well as of the House itself.

Mr. CONGER. Then I can see no reason for having the rule.

The SPEAKER. The one to which the gentleman refers concerns permanent changes of the rules. Does the gentleman demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; I do.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. DUNN and Mr. CONGER.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 114, noes 38.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1846) relating to the public lands of the United States and bringing it before the House for consideration. The rule provides, on a proposition to suspend the rules, fifteen minutes of debate shall be allowed to the friends and fifteen minutes to the opponents; but the Chair thinks, as this is a motion to bring the bill before the House for consideration, opportunity for debate could be had if the rules be suspended.

Mr. CONGER. Is debate allowable before the question is taken on the motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the wording of the rule would allow fifteen minutes before or fifteen minutes after.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have a few words before the motion is made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a fair construction, because it would weigh upon the subject and propriety of the suspension by two-thirds. The gentleman from Michigan claims the right for a part or the whole of the fifteen minutes to speak against the proposition. The rule says that there shall be a vote to debate the proposition. Still, the proposition, the Chair thinks, is to suspend the rules and consider this case, and preference is first to be given, however, under the rule, to those in favor of the proposition. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Michigan in opposition to the proposition. The gentleman from Arkansas yields to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by myself at the extra session of the present Congress. It was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. That committee considered it maturely and thoroughly for two days. At the end of that time the committee reported in favor of it unanimously. The purpose of the bill is to provide a mode for the settlement of the numerous suits for trespass on the public lands which have been begun in many quarters of the Union and especially in the district which I have the honor to represent. Up to the time when the present administration came into power there were few if any suits of that character.

The laws on the statute-books were a dead letter and trespasses upon the public lands had become common. The Government had permitted and by the policy it pursued had encouraged the people to treat the public domain as common property. When the present administration came into power it adopted as a rule the prosecution in every possible shape of all persons concerned in any manner either in trespassing upon the public lands or in dealing in timber taken from the public lands, whether the person dealing in the timber was an innocent purchaser or not. Many of these suits have been brought against persons who are innocent purchasers, dealers in logs or timber who have bought and paid their money, full value, in good faith. Some of the logs or timber they have bought is private property; some perhaps was cut on public land. The dealer in many cases has no means of knowing, in many cases he does not know, that the timber came from public land. He buys it in good faith, he pays for it its full market value in good faith, he adds to its value by sawing it up; but all this constitutes no defense at law. He is responsible for the full market value of the lumber he has made because the logs were cut on Government land, however innocent he may be.

I have no intention here to arraign the present administration or the motives of the officers of that administration. It is not necessary. It is the duty of that Department to prosecute under the law persons depreeding upon the public lands, as all admit. But, sir, the laws have heretofore not been enforced against trespassers. The people have not only been permitted but have been encouraged to trespass upon the public domain. Every homestead law has given a preference to the trespasser. To commence suddenly a system of prosecutions, to enforce them rigorously, exacting the extreme penalty of the law, is cruel and harsh. This bill is simply an attempt on the part of those having it in charge to provide a fair and equitable mode for the settlement of these suits, a mode that will prevent further resort to the system of spies and informers the Government has felt itself forced to resort to. Spies and informers, blackmailing one and reporting on another, now infest all parts of our timber-growing regions. The bill provides that where persons shall pay the Government prices for the lands and pay all costs of prosecution, every cent of costs the United States has been put to, then the suits against them shall be dismissed.

It provides further by amendment that it shall not apply to any trespass committed after the 1st day of March, 1879. This amendment was agreed to by the committee after hearing what was the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I myself consulted with that officer, and he approves of this bill as it now is, with the amendment proposed by the committee, as being substantially a fair and equitable basis upon which to settle all these suits.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the Secretary of the Interior has made any recommendation in that respect?

Mr. HERBERT. He has not.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me one question?

Mr. HERBERT. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. I have just seen the bill. I suppose the object of this is to relieve parties who have trespassed under the land laws for depredations of timber on the public lands. Owing to the confusion in this part of the bill I have not had the pleasure of hearing the beginning of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. HERBERT. I will state to the gentleman who represents California in part, that there is an amendment to the bill which makes it not applicable to the States of Oregon, California, or Nevada. That exception was made on the suggestion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, because there is already system provided by statute applicable to those States.

Mr. PAGE. Yes; there is a special law.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, and this bill does not in any way interfere with the law as it now exists in those States. And I will say to the gentleman from California further, that this is a better bill than that which was passed by the Forty-fifth Congress for those States west of the Rocky Mountains, in this, it carefully provides that its provisions shall not be applicable to any person committing trespass on the public lands after the 1st day of March, 1879. In other words, from that time on, the people everywhere had fair warning that the policy of this Government as to its public lands (which had heretofore been liable to trespass and depredations of this kind) was to be changed. Prosecutions had been begun. This gives fair notice to all trespassers that the Government would no longer submit to it. The amendment in this bill provides that no person trespassing after the 1st day of March, 1879, can claim the benefits of the bill.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the bill is simply a mode of settling all these suits which were begun against people who were led by the conduct of this Government itself, or by the negligence of this Government itself, for generations back, and by the policy of the laws of this Government, into trespassing upon public lands.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. HERBERT. With pleasure.

Mr. FORT. I wish to ask the gentleman about how many suits have been begun and what is the value of the timber that has been taken so far as the committee may be advised?

Mr. HERBERT. I have no means of knowing how many suits have been begun. A great many were begun, I know, in my district. Suits were begun against the trespassers, poor men, laboring men, who by the sweat of their brows had taken the timber from the public lands and in many cases these were nolle-prossed; others are pending; others have been brought against persons who have purchased the timber. And gentlemen know that if property be taken from the land of the United States, timber belonging to the Government, and put into merchantable shape, into the shape of a mast or of a spar, a tree which at the stump would not be worth more than fifty cents or a dollar may become, if free from all defects, worth $75 or $100 by the time it has got to market. And yet the Government has the right in strictness of law to recover of him who has purchased this mast or spar the full amount of $75. The simple question for us, the law-making department of the Government, is whether under all the circumstances it is not wiser, whether it is not fairer, whether it is not more just to the people to say, by adopting this bill, we will forgive no future trespassers on the public domain, but we will provide a mode by which the Government will be paid for its lands on which trespasses have been committed, by which it will be paid its costs, and by compliance with which defendants may rid themselves of embarrassing lawsuits.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes yielded to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] have expired. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] will claim the remaining five minutes to which he is entitled after the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has spoken.

Mr. CONGER. I think the rule requires those in favor of the proposition to exhaust their fifteen minutes first, before the fifteen minutes are allowed in opposition to the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The rule is not peremptory on that point. It says: One-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of and one-half to debate in opposition to such proposition.

Mr. PAGE. Who has the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to oppose the proposition.

Mr. CONGER. Let the fifteen minutes in its favor first be exhausted.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to be allowed five minutes.

Mr. DUNN. All the time allowed to me is engaged. I have agreed to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WASHBURN,] after the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has spoken.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill where is the restriction that makes March, 1879, the limit?

Mr. DUNN. That is in the amendments to be reported by the committee. I will report those amendments as soon as the rules are suspended and the bill is brought before the House for consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would suggest that before we vote on the proposition to suspend the rules those amendments should be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. They may be read for information.

Mr. DUNN. Will the time occupied in the reading be taken from the time allowed for debate?

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought the friends of the bill had five minutes which they did not know what to do with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is mistaken. The time which remains for debate in favor of the proposition has been yielded to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WASHBURN,] The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] makes the point of order that the gentleman from Minnesota must proceed now, and that the whole fifteen minutes of debate in favor of the proposition must be occupied together. The Chair thinks that is at least a hard construction to put on the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to suggest that on a measure of this great importance we ought not to be delayed by a mere technicality so that we should not hear read amendments which ought to be read for the information of the House before we vote on the proposition to suspend the rules. I hope that will be allowed by unanimous consent.

Mr. DUNN. There is no objection to having the amendments read now. It is merely a question of the consumption of time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not charge the time occupied in the reading to the time allowed for debate.

Mr. DUNN. The amendments are unanimously reported from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WILLITS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question. Does the Secretary of the Interior recommend this bill?

Mr. DUNN. I know of no communication that has been had with the Secretary of the Interior on the subject of this bill. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] has had an interview with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who concurs in and indeed suggested most of these amendments.

Mr. WILLITS. Is the gentleman from Arkansas at all advised what the views of the Secretary of the Interior are?

Mr. DUNN. Personally I am not.

Mr. WILLITS. I am informed that the Secretary of the Interior is opposed to this bill.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to say that the commission appointed by the President under the law of last Congress has recommended substantially the provisions of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The proposed amendments will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend bill (H. R. No. 1846) by striking out the words "the approval of this act," where they occur in line 9 of section 1, and insert in lieu thereof the words and figures "March 1, 1879."

2. By striking out in lines 10 and 11, section 1, where they occur, the words "begin before such payment."

3. By inserting the word "entry" in line 13 of section 1, in lieu of the word "payment."

4. By inserting in lieu of the words "$1.25 per acre," in lines 6 and 7 of section 2, the words "the Government price."

5. Amend section 4 by adding at the end thereof the following: "Provided, This act shall not apply to lands in California, Oregon, Nevada, or Arizona."

Mr. POUND. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POUND. I desire to inquire whether it would be competent to move an amendment to either of these amendments which have been reported by the committee?

The SPEAKER. It will be, if they are not cut off by calling the previous question.

Mr. DUNN. It is my purpose, as soon as the House shall vote to consider this bill now, to report these amendments which have been read.

Mr. POUND. - My question is whether other amendments will be allowed.

Mr. DUNN. I am not authorized to allow other amendments. As soon as I have reported from the Committee on the Public Lands the amendments which have been read, I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HERBERT,] who will take charge of the bill.

Mr. POUND. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that the reason of my inquiry is that I have been informed that the friends of this bill would permit an amendment which would make it applicable only to cases which have occurred prior to January 1, 1878. I see that the committee have reported an amendment making it applicable only to cases that occurred prior to 1879.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. CONGER. This very important bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole and placed on the Public Calendar so that it could be considered in general debate and be amended and discussed under the five-minute rule. In that position this very dangerous and sweeping bill could be considered, could be amended, could be shown up to be exactly what it is in all its naked and in all its concealed deformities. No man in fifteen minutes can go through the recital of the facts necessary to an understanding of this bill. I shall not attempt to do so.

I propose to say just so much as occurs to me now and as I have time to say, to satisfy gentlemen of the House, if I am able, that under all the rules of the House and for all reasons of right and justice and governmental propriety this bill should be left in the Committee of the Whole to receive there a careful and prudent consideration.

The occasion for the passage of such a bill as this arises from the fact that in the United States a very large number of trespassers, both individually and, as is alleged, collectively, by their own individual wrong-doing, and collectively by conspiracies and attempts to mislead and attempts to defraud the Government of the United States, have entered upon the timber lands of the Government, mostly in the Southern States, somewhat in the North, where the Government has remaining timber lands, and have taken and appropriated to themselves, and sold to others wherever they could find a market, the property of the United States without right and without authority of law, and in so doing have covered their tracks wherever they could in making these acquisitions of the United States property, and have involved all over the country innocent purchasers of the property which is the subject-matter of this bill.

In other words, if we were talking about the relations of the parties to be protected by this bill toward private citizens, we should call them the stealers of property, the thieves of property, the conspirators to defraud individuals of property. These parties have been prosecuted under the law, a large number of them, both for the trespass, as it is called, on the public lands, or the stealing of this property of the United States, and by suits brought against scores of individuals for conspiring together in numbers more or less to defraud the United States of its property and of its rights.

It only needs to have the bill read to see the character of the transactions which are to be covered, not with the scriptural mantle of charity, but to be covered by the mantle of legislation. What is this bill? It is a bill to permit the original trespassers upon the public lands and the original conspirators to hide their tracks in thus "taking" the public property, to use the milder phrase which it always becomes my nature and disposition to use on these occasions to shield them from further prosecution, to shield them from punishment for their wrongful acts; in the language of this bill, to give back to them the material which they had thus taken by trespass or by theft, to give it back to them with all the rights of property, and thus allow them to follow, not only those who have purchased from their colleagues in this wrong, the co-conspirators in this wrong, but even to follow those who have made purchase of this property when taken and sold by marshals of the United States; to follow the property out on to the Gulf, to all the Gulf ports, and on all the railroads to every interior station; to follow it to the very house of the purchaser who bought this property and incorporated it into his home.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to explain why that term "conspirator" was put in the bill? I put it in myself.

Mr. CONGER. Not now. If the House will do its duty and keep this bill in Committee of the Whole there will be time enough there for all the explanation that can possibly be given for the passage of such a wondrous, such a remarkable, such an iniquitous bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I will not take more than one minute to explain, if you will let me do it.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman desires to have a vote upon the motion to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of this bill, without any explanation at all. He desires to take the bill away from the Committee of the Whole and bring it into the House where the majority can control it and keep out amendments under the previous question.

Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to release hundreds of men under prosecution or liable to prosecution. It releases hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property now in the hands of the officers of the United States. This Government has expended large sums of money in trying to protect the interests of the United States and the people against trespassers, against thieves on the public lands, against conspirators who have carefully concealed their trespasses from the eye of the public and from the eye of the Government. This bill requires the payment of individual costs in suits already commenced. Large sums of money, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, which the Government has expended in following up and exposing these nefarious transactions, (to say nothing of the cost of so many suits,) are to go for naught. Those who have done a great wrong are by one act of law to have gathered into their embrace all the property taken, with all the value placed upon it by its manufacture. The Government is to pay for this. We are to condone the guilt of the wrong-doers and restore to them all that they have purloined, stolen, taken, trespassed upon.

To any one who will read the bill, all these considerations must suggest themselves. I have tried only to call attention to the measure, and ask whether it is proper that the Committee of the Whole should be discharged from the consideration of the bill that it may be placed where its full discussion can be prevented; where the previous question can be called, with no opportunity allowed for amendments which my friends here desire to offer. Shall we place the bill in a situation to be passed, if possible, without discussion and without knowledge on the part of members of the House as to its real object and merits?

I have fulfilled a duty unpleasant to myself in antagonizing the taking of this bill from the Committee of the Whole. If it can be discussed there, let it stay there. If it can be shown in Committee of the Whole that the bill is just to the Government, just to the people, just to those who desire to pre-empt or already have homesteads on this land, there will be opportunity to show all this; there will be none under the manner of treatment now proposed. I call upon those who desire to protect the interests of the Government and of the great masses of the people as against trespassers, not to take this bill from the Committee of the Whole, where it can be thoroughly sifted.

If I am wrong in my views, if I have been misinformed, if it be true, as I understand it to be, that the Secretary of the Interior, who has zealously prosecuted all these trespassers, is opposed to the bill, and would say so except that he does not desire to obtrude himself into our legislative proceedings, that will appear. If there be any good reason for passing the bill, that will appear. Until these things do appear, I warn gentlemen against placing themselves on record as encouraging the stealing of the property of the United States from any quarter, and condoning the theft by paying a premium to the trespassers at the expense of the people.

Mr. DUNN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy only a very few moments in discussion of the bill under consideration. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has, it seems to me, endeavored to mislead the House with regard to the force and effect of this bill, and I desire to correct the impression which he may have created.

Mr. CONGER. I believe I have one minute remaining. I will yield that, after the gentleman from Minnesota has finished, to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. WASHBURN. This bill when introduced was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, who after very careful and deliberate consideration agreed that it was just and proper. They therefore recommended its passage. Before that, however, I went to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and submitted the bill to him, asking his judgment upon it. He said that with two or three amendments which he suggested the bill was right and proper, and that it was really the most equitable and practicable settlement that could be made of this litigation which has grown up in the last two years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the facts are simply these: For the last twenty years or more it has been the practice of the Government almost uniformly to allow people to cut timber from the public lands. The officers not only permitted this but invited it, so that it has been regarded not as a crime or misdemeanor, but as a transaction entirely legitimate. It has been going on all over the country for many years. The present Secretary of the Interior has, however, taken steps (very properly I think) to stop this abuse. In the course of the investigation which he very properly made he found that in very many cases trespassers had cut timber seven or eight years ago, had taken the logs to market, sold them and received the pay therefor. The suits now pending are almost invariably, so far as my section of the country is concerned, brought against innocent purchasers. The property was traced into their hands; they had converted it and are held responsible, while the parties who really committed the trespass, the men who cut the logs seven or eight years ago, are irresponsible and cannot be reached. Thus the effect of this litigation is that innocent parties, men who bought the logs and paid the full price for them six or seven years ago, are at this late hour called upon to pay again the entire amount.

These men are in a position from which they should be relieved; and the effect of this bill is simply to allow them to go back and enter the identical land from which these logs were cut. I do not see that by this measure any great injustice is to be done to the Government. I do not see that anybody is to be robbed. The bill merely allows these people who have been led into difficulty to go back and enter the land de novo in the same manner as they could have done many years since and before the logs were cut.

It seems to me that the bill is a proper one. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has properly described it as the most equitable and practicable method that can be reached for the settlement of this whole business. I trust it will be passed.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules,

The SPEAKER declared that in his opinion two-thirds had not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HERBERT called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HERBERT and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 60; less than two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

Mr. LEWIS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 114, nays 89, not voting 89; as follows:

Mr. CALKINS. I was assured that Mr. HOOKER, if present, would vote in the affirmative, and therefore I voted in the affirmative.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I was assured that General CHALMERS, with whom I am paired, if present, would vote in the affirmative, and therefore I voted in the affirmative.

ABOLITION OF TOLLS, LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. CABELL. I have been instructed by the Committee on Railways and Canals to move that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 4507) to abolish all tolls at the Louisville and Portland Canal, and that the same be passed.

The bill, which was read, provides that after the 1st day of July, 1880, no tolls shall be charged or collected at the Louisville and Portland Canal, but the Secretary of War shall be authorized to draw his warrant from time to time upon the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the actual expenses of operating and keeping said canal in repair.

Mr. CABELL. That is accompanied by a report which can be read by the Clerk if desired by any gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope it will be read.

The SPEAKER. The first question under the rule is the seconding the motion for the suspension of the rules.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it in order to ask for the reading of the report at this time?

The SPEAKER. The report might be read as a part of the debate provided for under the rule. There should be a second first, because it is hardly desirable debate should be allowed if there shall be no second of the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. CABELL. I do not propose to debate it at all. I am satisfied to rest the case on the report.

Mr. WILLITS. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. CABELL and Mr. WILLITS. The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 143, noes 11.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Is debate demanded?

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. CABELL. As I do not care to occupy the floor myself in debating this question, I have no objection that the report be read now.

The SPEAKER. The report had better be read as a part of the gentleman's time.

Mr. CABELL. For myself I have no objection to that.

The report was read, as follows:

The navigation of the Ohio River is obstructed at Louisville, Kentucky, during ten months of the year by a natural impediment known as the "Rapids," or "Falls." In the year 1825, for the purpose of overcoming this impediment, the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, under a charter from the State of Kentucky, constructed a canal around the falls, at a cost of over $1,000,000. In this company the United States was an original stockholder to the amount of $233,500. Recognizing the national importance of the improvement and responding to the demands of public sentiment, the Federal Government gradually purchased with its accrued dividends the residue of the stock. In the year 1846 it had purchased the greater portion, and at the close of the year 1855 it owned the whole of the property, except five shares, valued at $500. Subsequently these five shares were bought, and on the 11th of June, 1874, the Government assumed, and has ever since retained, the sole management and control.

The Louisville and Portland Canal is the connecting link in the great chain of commerce between the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other places east of the Alleghany, and the cities of Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, Saint Louis, and other important points west and northwest of the Appalachian Range. It is the lock and key to the whole system of river navigation from the headwaters of the Ohio to the Gulf of Mexico. Over three thousand boats and barges pass through its locks in the descending and ascending navigation of the Ohio River. The number of tons carried by these boats during the past year was 999,610. This immense tonnage will, it is believed, in the near future attain even more gigantic proportions.

Up to the 11th of June, 1874, the tollage paid by all vessels propelled by steam was fifty cents per ton. From the year 1831, when the canal was first opened for business, to 1872, the tolls received at this point amounted to $5,157,247. Since the Government assumed control the tolls have been reduced to one-fifth of the former amount. But, even with this reduction, over $300,000 has been collected, thus swelling the grand total which the producers and shippers of twelve or fourteen States of our country have paid to pass an obstruction of less than two miles on one of our national highways to over $5,500,000.

The bill under consideration proposes that at the close of the present fiscal year the tolls now collected by the Government shall cease. Your committee report that such a result is in accord with the spirit, if not the letter, of former treaties; that it is in accord with the action of the State of Kentucky, through her Legislature, and of the board of trustees of the canal company, preliminary to the surrender of the property; and that it has been emphatically favored by numerous committees of this House in former Congresses. The treaty of Paris, negotiated in 1783; the treaty with Spain, negotiated in 1795; the ordinance of 1797, and many subsequent acts of Congress, provide for the absolute freedom of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and dedicate them to the world as great national highways, to be kept forever free from any toll, tax, or duty of any kind whatever.

As far back as the 4th of March, 1834, a bill was reported to this House from the Committee on Roads and Canals to buy the stock of this canal, and make the navigation of the Ohio River "free to all." "The munificence of the Government," says the committee "has been often extended to the Atlantic States, in expenditures on the seaboard and elsewhere, and now every sentiment of justice and impulse of patriotism plead for the exercise of the same liberality toward those who inhabit the valley of the Mississippi."

On the 31st of December, 1845, the Committee on Commerce in this House reported a resolution making the Louisville and Portland Canal "free from toll." On the 27th of February, 1851, the Committee on Roads and Canals in the Senate reported a bill to the same effect; and on the 2d day of August, 1852, the same committee in this House submitted a similar bill, with an elaborate report in its favor.

To the same end the State of Kentucky, by an act of its Legislature of February 21, 1842, authorized the canal company to sell the shares owned by individuals, or the State of Kentucky, for the city of Louisville, "for the purpose of eventually making the said canal free of tolls." So, also, on the 14th of December, 1867, Hon. James Guthrie, then president of the canal company, in reply to a note of General Weitzel, declared that the object of the trust which the company held was to "make the canal sufficient for the requirements of the Ohio River, and, finally, to make it a free canal."

These various treaties, reports, acts, and official declarations clearly indicate that for nearly half a century it has been the desire and intent of the Government to secure the free navigation of the Ohio at this point. But whatever be the meaning of former treaties and resolutions, your committee are of opinion that the time has now arrived when, as a matter of right as well as of policy, every restriction or tax should be removed and this canal declared free to the whole world.

"The right of way," once said a great statesman, "is the right of the million." The sovereign holds it in trust, and can exercise it only for their benefit, and has no right to make a revenue or permit a revenue to be made out of it. Such a course must engender the worst oppression and the worst corruptions, and soon realize the view of the worst governments—taxation on all we consume—which will allow nothing to go to or from the markets without tribute to the state.

Your committee find that in every other instance except that of the Louisville and Portland Canal this great popular right has been recognized and respected. At the Eads jetties, at the harbor of New York, at the canal uniting the upper and lower rapids of the Mississippi River, and at various other points vast sums of money, amounting to hundreds of millions, have been expended. From none of these works, of which the Government is the sole owner, has any toll or tax ever been demanded, and yet hardly one of them is of more importance or more national in its character than this canal.

Your committee see no reason why the people of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys should be deprived of the benefits of that policy which has been so fully pursued, to the advantage of commerce, at every other point in the Union, and therefore report back the bill and respectfully recommend that it be adopted.

Mr. CABELL. The report just read sets forth so fully the facts in connection with this matter that I do not care to discuss it any further. Unless gentlemen on the other side desire an opportunity to do so I hope the vote will be taken on it at once.

Mr. CONGER. I desire a few minutes on this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be allowed fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. DUNNELL. Have the fifteen minutes allowed in favor of the bill been entirely consumed in reading the report?

Mr. CABELL. I had intended to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota in favor of this bill if he desired.

Mr. CONGER. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota out of my time if he desires it. I presume he wishes to speak in favor of the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do.

The SPEAKER. How many minutes does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONGER. I will yield to him five minutes.

Mr. CABELL. Was it proper to take the time allowed on this side and consume it in reading the report?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated himself that he had no objection to have the report read in his time.

Mr. CABELL. I stated that so far as I was individually concerned I did not desire to debate the proposition; but there are other gentlemen who do desire an opportunity of saying a word upon it, if debate is had in opposition to it, and I wish to yield to them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold the reading of the report as in the nature of debate in favor of the proposition.

Mr. CONGER. In order that what I may say may be entirely fair, I will now occupy a portion of the time that I am entitled to, and then, at the expiration of ten minutes, will yield the remaining five minutes of my time to gentlemen on the other side to answer what I may say.

Mr. CABELL. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, for all the length of time that I have been a member of this House I trust I have been as active and earnest as any member of the House in reference to the improvement of our water communications and making them practically free to the commerce of the United States. Such has been my desire, and I think I have always acted in that direction. If the committee which reported this bill had reported the substantial facts in the case, I should not have desired to make any remarks at all. And I wish to say now in regard to this great channel of commerce and all others which are internal or which may be improved, I am very anxious that every possible facility shall be given for their navigation and for free commerce upon all of these interior waters as well as the external harbors of the United States. But in regard to this canal allow me to say first that there are three canals on which Government money has been expended where the tolls still remain, although built entirely by Government appropriations.

One of these to which I allude is the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, upon which tolls to a much larger amount in the aggregate, although perhaps not greater on the tonnage, are still collected. I recall, Mr. Speaker, what to the old members of the House are very familiar subjects, that after the Government had expended I think about $3,470,000 or near that sum in rebuilding the Louisville and Portland Canal, it was found that although the Government had acquired in one way and another most of the stock of the old canal, and gentlemen will remember that the $5,000,000 tolls was collected by a private company chartered by the State of Kentucky, and all these tolls went into the pockets of private individuals and not to the Government—

Mr. FORT. That relates to the stock held by the Government of the United States?

Mr. CONGER. The United States surrendered its portion of it to the canal company by act of Congress.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Michigan I know would not misrepresent the facts, but he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CONGER. I had an examination of this subject as a member of the Committee on Commerce for so many months or years, I may say, that I think I know the facts generally. But it is not material and I will not insist. The Government was only a small shareholder. But the point is this: It was found that after the Government had expended the amount necessary, and more than was necessary, to open this great channel of commerce, advocated by all of us in the House and the money appropriated in the river and harbor bill from year to year until it was finished, it was found then that although the stock of the company had been in some way secured and the United States surrendered what belonged to Kentucky and what belonged to individuals, there yet remained outstanding bonds of the company in the hands of private individuals for nearly a million and a quarter of dollars. I think, aside from the cost of constructing the new canal, the amount was between $1,100,000 and $1,200,000, but in round numbers, with interest, it amounted to about one and a quarter million dollars. A bill was passed reducing tolls from fifty cents to twenty-five cents a ton. The bondholders went into the courts and enjoined this reduction of the tolls under the law of Congress, because the tolls were pledged to the payment of interest and the final payment of this million and a quarter of bonds. The bondholders, as against Congress and as against those who desired a reduction, were successful and victorious in the courts.

Then we looked for some other way of making a free canal. We studied the question carefully for a year or two before we could perfect the bill, and finally Congress was forced, in order to approach the subject of a free canal or free commerce at all, to the necessity of voting in round numbers a million and a quarter of dollars directly out of the Treasury to pay these bonds. A law was passed, and aside from the three or four million dollars to build this new canal we were obliged to vote directly out of the Treasury to pay the old bondholders a million and a quarter of dollars. With the consent and approval of the executive committee of the steamboat owners association, who had their representatives here, many of them large owners of steamboats on the river, and if I should mention their names gentlemen would all recognize them as such, it was finally agreed that the Government would appropriate a million and a quarter of dollars and remove that obstruction which stood in the courts and everywhere against making a free canal. But, for the incidental expenses, the payment of the interest that was provided for, and the working of the canal, it was agreed all around that until there had been repaid to the Government this million and a quarter of dollars there should be a reduction to ten cents a ton, and that that should be collected until this advanced money was paid, and that thereafter there should only be such an amount of tolls as should pay for opening and closing the locks and working the canal, which would be a very small amount of toll on so large a tonnage.

In the interest of commerce, in the interest of navigation, in the interest of all those people of the Ohio Valley, and those beyond and on this side, we labored for weeks and weeks and months and months to find some way in which to cut that Gordian knot, with which the bondholders, by the action of the courts, were preventing us from even approaching the freedom of commerce and navigation on that canal. A rate of fifty cents a ton on this tonnage was enormous and the old canal company and the bondholders had received between five and six millions of dollars of tolls upon the old, small, imperfect, almost, as it was said, worthless canal.

I do not make these remarks, Mr. Speaker, to oppose this motion. If the committee were to present the case fairly to the House, as I think in justice they ought to do, when they ask us to remove all tolls, and when, let it be remembered, they propose to make a permanent appropriation out of the Treasury, without any new appropriation from year to year, for all expenses of working the canal and keeping it in repair, I think the committee should have stated these important and serious facts. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the reports of the Committee on Commerce in those days will show how anxious everybody was to remove this burden on commerce and how gratified we all were, who were in favor of free navigation of our waters, that we were able to get the House to appropriate a million and a quarter of dollars to pay up these bonds and then to reduce the tolls down four-fifths. I do not make these remarks exactly to oppose the bill. I make them that the House may understand that former Congresses did a very great work when they did pay out to bondholders the million and a quarter of dollars, beside the three or four million dollars to enlarge and make good the canal, the only thing reserved to save the expense to the Treasury being the ten-cent tolls for a limited time, until it should seem as if the Government had received back from the vessel-owners a part of this extra expense in paying the bondholders. For myself, I think it would be just and right that that should run a few years longer. I dislike that there should be a permanent appropriation which has no limit. If there be damage to the canal or the locks or the gates, or a breaking away of the walls, the repair of the canal might cost one hundred thousand dollars or half a million of dollars, on account of injuries by floods or by the running of vessels against the walls of the canal, or their undermining. In this bill you make a permanent appropriation for all the expenses of repairs and for working the canal hereafter. I make these remarks not as being exactly opposed to the bill, but that we may understand what we are doing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. DUNNELL. I could not believe the gentleman from Michigan could after all seriously oppose this bill. His whole history in Congress is against his argument, and he announces at last that he does not propose to make any argument against the passage of the bill. He closes, however, Mr. Speaker, by referring to the possibility that there may be large sums of money required in the future to keep this canal in repair.

I would ask him if the same argument does not exist against the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and whether the same argument would not hold against the Des Moines Canal, which has cost the Government five or six millions of dollars, and for the annual running of which we appropriate at least $40,000.

Mr. CONGER. Not for the Sault Ste. Marie Canal.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am now referring to the Des Moines Canal, and that appropriation is for all time. The argument the gentleman uses in that direction falls to the ground.

I am in favor of this bill because it tends to make completely free to commerce the great Ohio River. I believe there should be no obstruction to commerce upon the Mississippi River or any of its tributaries, and that the Government is amply able not only to give this canal to the commerce of the Ohio River but to keep it in operation and repair for a long time and always.

We have built the Des Moines Rapids Canal upon the Mississippi River, at a cost, as I have said, of five or six millions of dollars; and we are annually appropriating money for its maintenance, and shall be compelled to do so. When we look at the statistics of the commerce of the Ohio River we will see that this small amount is substantially nothing at all.

Mr. WILLIS. I would inquire of the gentleman if it is true that it was understood at the time the Government took possession of this canal and reduced the tolls from fifty cents a ton to ten cents a ton that the toll of ten cents per ton would be kept up until the Government should receive back the million and a quarter of dollars it had paid to the stockholders?

Mr. DUNNELL. I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. WILLIS. With the permission of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] I will answer the gentleman. From the beginning to the end there has never been any such understanding, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is mistaken in that as he was mistaken in the statement that $5,000,000 was received by the private stockholders of this canal prior to its surrender to the Government. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, as shown by the report, that the United States was an original stockholder to the amount of $233,500. This subscription of stock was made in the year 1825. In the year 1831, the canal was regularly opened for business. In 1845 a report to Congress was made by which it appeared that the Government had not only received back in actual money paid into the Treasury of the United States the $233,500 originally invested, but $24,278 over and above that amount. In other words the money dividends paid to the United States up to the 3d of January, 1842, from this canal company amounted to $257,778. Nor was this all. In addition to this large sum of money, the Government became the owner of twenty-nine hundred and two shares of stock, which was five hundred and sixty-seven more shares than it had originally subscribed for, there having been a stock dividend in the mean while declared. Each share was at the time this report was made, December 31, 1845, worth $148. Taking the par value of the stock, the report goes on to show that the Government, instead of losing by the investment made in this canal, as has been the case, it is believed, in every other investment for internal improvements, had not only had every dollar of the investment returned, but was the gainer $314,478.

Thus, sir, it appeared that up to that time instead of giving the sum of $233,500 to facilitate and improve and remove the obstructions to the commerce of the western country the Government had in fact imposed a tax upon that commerce and received from it into the Treasury, in cash and valuable stock, $453,774.

I refer the gentleman for these facts to the report made by Mr. Tibbatts, from the Committee on Commerce, to the first session of the Twenty-ninth Congress on the 31st of December, 1845.

This report emphatically protests against these tolls as a tax upon the agricultural products of the West and South and the manufactured goods of the East, ultimately paid by the consumers, and declares them to be a heavy and burdensome imposition upon the commerce of the West. The official records show, Mr. Speaker, that this burden increased with the increasing commerce of the country. They show further that the proportion of these enormous profits, great as it was, as shown by the report of Mr. Tibbatts, became even greater from year to year. This resulted from the fact that on the 18th of February, 1842, by an act of the Legislature of Kentucky, the president and board of directors of the canal company were authorized, whenever so directed by the stockholders thereof, to sell "the shares of stock owned by individuals in said canal to the United States, or the State of Kentucky, or the city of Louisville, for the purpose of eventually making the said canal free of tolls." The act further provided that the shares so purchased should be held in trust until by the operations of the provisions of this act all the shares standing in the name of others than the Government of the United States should be purchased, whereupon the canal was to be transferred to the Government of the United States.

Pursuant to this act and following out its original policy, the Government began to appropriate its dividends to the purchase of the residue of individual stock. Owning already 2,911 shares in 1843, it purchased 471 shares more; in 1844, 544 shares, and so on until in the year 1846 it owned 5,353 shares, which was a majority of all the stock, the total amount being 10,000 shares. It continued to purchase stock until at the close of the year 1855 it had redeemed in this way and was the owner of the whole property except five shares, worth at their face value the sum of $500. These five shares were afterward bought, and on the 11th of June, 1874, the Government assumed and has ever since retained the sole management and control. It appears from a report made by General Weitzel to the Secretary of War that between the years 1842, when Mr. Tibbatts estimated the income of the Government from this source, to the year 1874, when the Government took charge of it, the sum of $4,331,953 was paid for tolls. Bearing these facts in mind, it will be seen that the largest portion of these tolls has gone to the Federal Government. The complete statement shows that the United States became the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal and the Portland dry-dock in the year 1855 excepting five shares. It shows further that the United States acquired this property without leaving one dollar outstanding from the National Treasury, and still further shows that in addition to the property thus obtained it acquired $24,278 in money, that sum having been paid in cash dividends beyond the sum originally invested by the Government in the stock of the company. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is therefore mistaken when he states that $5,000,000 from tolls was received by the private stockholders of this canal. The fact is that four-fifths of the amount of tolls received went to the Federal Government as the principal stockholder from 1831 to the present time.

Mr. CONGER. I must say that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] is absolutely wrong.

Mr. WILLIS. I will read—

Mr. CONGER, (interrupting.) I do not take the report.

Mr. WILLIS. I have the acts of the Legislature of Kentucky and other official data, but I am unwilling to trespass further on the time of the gentleman who has the floor, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I am willing that it shall come out of my time.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to hear them read, if they give us the facts.

Mr. WILLIS. I have here the proceedings of the Legislature of Kentucky; of the trustees of the Louisville and Portland Canal; of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, together with resolutions of merchants and steamboat men of Louisville, Pittsburgh, Saint Louis, and elsewhere throughout the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys, which earnestly protest against this heavy tax and demand that the same beneficent policy which has been extended to other portions of the country should be applied to the Ohio River. Nowhere in those proceedings do I find any understanding or agreement as referred to by the honorable gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] Nowhere do they evidence any understanding or contract or consent that the navigation of the Ohio River, that great artery of commerce through which passes the trade of fourteen States of this Union, should be tied up in this way. Whenever the people of the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys have spoken upon this subject, it has been for the free navigation of their great river.

Only last October the National Board of Steam Navigation, which met at Cincinnati, a body composed of delegates from all parts of the Union, and representing a capital of $600,000,000, recommended the adoption of a resolution "that the Louisville and Portland Canal be made free from all tolls." That this was and always has been the purpose of the Government in regard to this improvement is evidenced by its original subscription of stock. It is further evidenced by the appropriation of its dividends for the purchase of other stock, under the act of the Legislature of Kentucky, which I have already cited, and which authorizes the purchase of the stock "for the purpose of eventually making the said canal free of tolls." It is still further shown by repeated reports from various committees of this House, beginning as far back as the 4th of March, 1834, and thence down to the present time. The report of Mr. Tibbatts, which I referred to just now, was in response to a "petition of the merchants and steamboat owners of the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi, praying Congress to purchase the individual stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal for the purpose of making it free from toll." The report of the committee upon this petition was favorable. The report of the committee having charge of this bill quotes and refers to numerous similar reports and bills. The most cursory view of these acts and resolutions will show that it has been the ultimate purpose of the Government to bring about this result, a result, Mr. Speaker, which is demanded both by justice, sound political economy, and true patriotism. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota for permitting me to interrupt him in this way, and hope that the House will pass the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. Suppose the Government did agree as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] states; suppose there was an understanding of that kind?

Mr. WILLITS. Then this bill in effect does release the claim of the Government to be reimbursed that million and a quarter of dollars. I want to know what the fact is.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The thirty minutes' time allowed by the rule for debate has expired.

The question was then taken upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and it was agreed to; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ADDITIONAL COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. ACKLEN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to move that the rules be suspended and that the House adopt the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the sub-committee of the Committee on Commerce, who have been already directed by a resolution of this House of February 4, 1880, to examine the testimony in the Interior Department and to take such other as may be necessary in relation to the obstruction of navigation and seizure of property therein referred to, and report, are hereby authorized to employ a clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers of the chairman.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask consent to have read the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. CONGER. Does that relate to obstructions in the San Juan River, Central America?

Mr. ACKLEN. No sir, it does not refer to that at all. The report if read will give all the information.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of February 4, 1880, relative to the seizure of certain property in Louisiana, report as follows:

Your committee find the resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, authorized, by sub-committee, to examine the papers and testimony on file in the Department of the Interior and take such other testimony as they may deem advisable relative to the seizure of the steamer of Captain Horn, and of other property of citizens of Lake Charles, Louisiana, by an agent of that Department, and report back to this House.

Your committee find that the testimony in the Interior Department amounts to about one thousand pages. There is also further testimony without which your committee cannot proceed to carry out the order of the House without clerical assistance; and believing the questions involved are of sufficient importance to warrant a careful examination they report back to the House the following resolution asking clerical assistance and recommend its passage.

Mr. HAZELTON. Is this resolution open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] whether this matter relates to the Calcasieu log seizure, or is in any way connected with that transaction?

Mr. ACKLEN. It is in part, as I can explain.

Mr. ROBINSON. That subject, I will state, is before the Committee on the Judiciary at the present time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana demand a second?

Mr. ACKLEN. I do.

Mr. ACKLEN and Mr. ROBINSON were appointed tellers.

During the count,

Mr. ACKLEN said: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] informs me that this matter is now before the Committee on the Judiciary. I am aware of that fact, and also that the matter was before that committee in the Forty-fifth Congress, and through a sub-committee, consisting of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] Mr. Stenger, and Mr. Butler, a report on the matter was prepared; but that report was not acted on by the House; that was for the appointment of a select committee; this resolution is to appoint a clerk. This, therefore, in my opinion is not properly before that committee at all. I would like to be allowed to explain.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think I ought to be allowed a word in reply to the gentleman. He is mistaken in supposing that this subject is not before the Committee on the Judiciary of the present Congress. I was not a member of that committee in the Forty-fifth Congress, though I am in the Forty-sixth. I am also a member of the sub-committee, to which has been specially referred the Calcasieu log seizure; and as we have heard the gentleman himself before the sub-committee, I know that the subject is pending in the Judiciary Committee of this Congress.

Mr. ACKLEN. Not in this form and shape; the matter to which the gentleman refers I can fully explain if allowed. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen will resume their places as tellers.

Mr. ACKLEN. I withdraw the proposition for the present.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX obtained the floor.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COX. I hope my colleague will withdraw that motion. I desire to submit, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a motion to suspend the rules.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 605) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GARFIELD, for one day; and

To Mr. CALDWELL, for ten days, on account of extreme illness in his family.

PRESIDIO GROUNDS, SAN FRANCISCO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the improvement of the grounds of the Presidio, San Francisco, California; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 2787) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes, be taken from the Speaker's table, and, with the amendments of the Senate, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

A. S. BLOOM.

Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5248) for the relief of A. S. Bloom; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

W. A. LEMASTER.

Mr. WEAVER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5249) for the relief W. A. Lemaster, administrator of the estate of Margaret Lemaster, deceased, pensioner of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair this morning, in accordance with the request of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE,] who is sick abed, asked that the bill relative to Pacific Railroads, which was pending upon that gentleman's motion to suspend the rules, might go over by unanimous consent till the third Monday of April, the next day on which motions from committees to suspend the rules can be recognized. The Chair is not certain in his own mind whether there was or was not objection to that request. Therefore he again submits it.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. My colleague [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] withdraws his motion to adjourn.

Mr. WILLITS. I renew it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair, before putting the question upon adjournment, will lay before the House certain executive communications.

There was no objection.

RESTORATION OF EX-OFFICERS TO THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition of officers of the Fifth Cavalry, relative to the restoration to the Army of certain ex-officers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TRADE BETWEEN ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC COAST.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House calling for certain commercial statistics relative to the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, &c.; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Interoceanic Canal, and, on motion of Mr. CONGER, ordered to be printed.

ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, relative to the use by railroad companies of the Government bridge at Rock Island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF HARBOR AT GREEN BAY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin, for an adequate appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Green Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SAN RAFAEL DEL VALLE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report by the surveyor-general of Arizona in the case of San Rafael Del Valle; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

CUSTOM-HOUSE PROPERTY AT DETROIT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to House resolution of February 18, 1880, relative to custom-house property; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

GRAND HAVEN, MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the improvement of the harbor at Grand Haven, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM—SAN IGNACIO DEL BABOCOMORI.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report by the surveyor-general of Arizona in the case of San Ignacio del Babocomori; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COF-FROTH,] chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, asks that House bill No. 3257, granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named, and for other purposes, be reprinted, the present print having been exhausted. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RELIEF FOR IRELAND.

Mr. COX. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and wish to know when I can get the floor.

The SPEAKER. The first Monday in April next. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I may die before then.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes not. The gentleman seems to be in good health.

Mr. COX. I ask, then, the privilege to print in the RECORD a joint resolution and report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in reference to which I wished to move a suspension of the rules.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The joint resolution and report are as follows:

Joint resolution providing national aid for the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland, and making an appropriation therefor.

Whereas the people of the United States have heard with deep concern of the alarming and widespread destitution and suffering prevailing in Ireland; and

Whereas that destitution is so imminent as to threaten famine, and is too great for the most munificent individual charity to more than partially relieve: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Government recognizes the claim upon its humanity to render national assistance and relief to the unfortunate sufferers; and for that purpose the sum of $500,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately expended under the direction of the Secretary of State: Provided, That the said Secretary shall cause the said sum to be properly distributed among the various relief associations organized in Ireland.

Mr. Cox, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany joint resolution H. R. No. 238:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom were submitted sundry joint resolutions, namely: House resolution 140, offered by Mr. FROST, of Missouri; House resolution 141, by Mr. GILLETTE, of Iowa; the memorial of the Saint Paul Chamber of Commerce; and House resolution 193, by Mr. PHELPS, of Connecticut, appropriating $100,000 for the relief of the sufferers from the Irish famine, beg leave to state that they have examined with much care and at some length the questions involved in said resolutions.

Three considerations naturally suggest themselves:

- First. As to the cause or occasion of the resolutions;
- Second. As to the power of Congress to make the appropriation asked; and
- Third. As to the policy of making it.

In the first place your committee is convinced that widespread suffering exists in various parts of Ireland, and more particularly in the western portions of the island and in the counties of Galway and Mayo.

The reports of the agents who have gone to Ireland to distribute the private charities of our people—notably reports from Rev. Dr. Hepworth and Mr. Redpath—concur with all other accounts, in this: that the calamities are fearfully imminent and mortal, even in the most favored localities, and that all of our private munificence will fail to reach and remedy the desperate prevalent distress. Every day adds to these dire necessities. They should be promptly relieved by the providence of man.

Without entering at all into the causes which have brought about the famine, it may be simply stated that there are upward of three hundred thousand people in Ireland who are actually suffering from want of bread. A great many of the unhappy Irish people have actually died of starvation and of disease brought on by lack of proper food. In several counties of that unfortunate country the people are existing upon a scant ration of meal and turnips, all the potatoes which they had raised for seed for the next crop having been consumed. It is estimated, too, from reliable sources, that many months must elapse, even into August, before that unfortunate people will be able to keep themselves. To add to these horrors of famine, a winter of unusual severity has prevailed in Ireland, and from trustworthy sources it is estimated that unless relief is extended at once upward of three hundred thousand men, women, and children will perish from cold and hunger. The simple recital of these facts, of which there can be no doubt, is enough to establish, in any humane mind, the fact that there is ample cause and occasion for the appropriation of $300,000 contained in the substitute reported herewith.

In the second place, has Congress the power to make this appropriation?

Without entering into argument upon this proposition, your committee find more than one precedent for the proposed action in the annals of our legislation.

In 1812, while our Republic was almost in its infancy, both as to population and resources, and while we were waging a costly and bloody war against Great Britain, there occurred in Venezuela an earthquake which utterly destroyed the city of Caracas. It plunged its people into the utmost want and distress.

About the same time intelligence reached the United States that the island of Tenerife, one of the Canary group, had been visited by swarms of locusts that had utterly destroyed the crops and fruit on that island, and that its inhabitants were in a state of starvation. The intelligence of this calamity, however, was vague and uncertain.

On the 29th of April, 1812, in the House of Representatives, Mr. Macon, then the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, submitted for the consideration of the House a resolution, which was as follows, (vide proceedings of Congress):

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to report a bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be purchased — barrels of flour, and to have the same exported to such port in Caraccas for the use of the inhabitants who have suffered by the earthquake; and also authorizing him to purchase — barrels of flour, and to have the same exported to some port in Tenerife for the use of the inhabitants who are likely to starve by the ravages of locusts."

No objection was raised as to the constitutional power of Congress to pass this resolution. The only objection which was urged against the resolution was based upon the fact that there was no authentic information in regard to the prevalence of famine in Tenerife. The question was taken upon the first clause of the resolution in regard to the relief of the people of Caraccas; and it passed unanimously. The Globe shows, upon the call of the yeas and nays, that such statesmen as James Breckinridge, John C. Calhoun, Langdon Cheves, Felix Grundy, Richard M. Johnson, William R. King, Nathaniel Macon, Israel Pickens, John Randolph, and George M. Troup voted in the affirmative. The second clause of the resolution, relating to the proposed aid to Tenerife, was lost by a vote of 47 yeas to 57 nays, because of the uncertainty of the information as to the extent of the famine existing on that island; but upon motion of John Randolph, of Virginia, the following resolution was unanimously passed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any and what relief ought to be extended to the inhabitants of the Canary Islands who are suffering from famine occasioned by locusts."

On the 4th of May, 1812, the House, in Committee of the Whole, appropriated $50,000 for the purpose of enabling the President to carry out the provisions of the resolution with regard to Caraccas. Mr. Newton had proposed to fix the appropriation at the sum of $30,000, but Mr. Calhoun moved to amend by inserting $50,000; which motion was adopted. The Senate concurred in the resolution of the House, and the relief was granted.

But a more recent precedent in our legislation is found in the action of the Senate with regard to Ireland in 1847. On the 26th of February of that year Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, introduced the following bill:

A bill to provide some relief for the suffering people of Ireland and Scotland.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to cause to be purchased such provisions as he may deem suitable and proper, and to cause the same to be transported and tendered in the name of the Government of the United States to that of Great Britain for the relief of the people of Ireland and Scotland suffering from the great calamity of scarcity and famine.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the sum of $500,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect this act.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to use the public ships of the United States for the transportation of the provisions to be purchased as aforesaid."

At that time our country was involved in war with Mexico; we were but a nation of twenty-six millions of people; our resources and our wealth were not one-half of what they are to-day.

The resolution of Mr. Crittenden was advocated by himself, by Messrs. Cass, of Michigan, Clayton, of Delaware, and Webster, of Massachusetts, and was made a special order for the succeeding day.

On the 27th of February, 1847, Mr. Crittenden moved the resolution; Mr. Webster suggested an amendment, which was accepted and concurred in, which would seem to make the tender of aid not so distinctly a tender from our Government to the British government. In his opinion "it was not delicate to do this;" he preferred "that the bill would show that it was an act of charity and mercy from the people of the United States to the people of Ireland and Scotland, mentioning the government of England only as the agent to dispense our bounty." This amendment was accepted by Mr. Crittenden. Mr. Calhoun supported the resolution in a short speech. In reply to the objection that Congress had no power, under the Constitution, to make such an appropriation of the people's money he said "that he drew a distinction between the power to make such an appropriation as this and an appropriation for ordinary domestic purposes."

Mr. Webster gave the measure his unhesitating support, and Mr. Crittenden said that he "laid down all constitutional objections at the feet of Mercy."

Mr. Dayton declared that he believed that no constitutional objection stood in the way of the appropriation proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

"In the life-time of a nation, as in that of individuals, there were emergencies when the hand of Providence presses heavily on a people, which might call for unusual measures of relief."

Upon a final vote, the bill was passed by the Senate by 27 yeas to 13 nays. Among those Senators who voted in the affirmative we find the names of Berrien, Calhoun, Cameron, Cass, Clayton, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, Dayton, Evans, Houston, Reverdy Johnson, Mangum, Moorehead, Pierre Soule, and Webster.

This bill failed in the House, because of the adjournment seven days after its passage in the Senate, which left no time for its consideration; but a vote was taken in the House upon a motion to lay the bill upon the table, and it was voted down, and then the bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, on the 1st day of March, and failed of consideration because Congress adjourned on the 4th by limitation. The House of Representatives, as well as the Senate, of 1847 committed Congress to the policy of charitable aid to a suffering people. They passed a bill almost unanimously, through both bodies, donating the services of national vessels for the purpose of transporting aid to the people of Ireland. The present Congress unanimously followed this precedent, in a bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill for the relief of Caraccas, which was passed in 1812, met the immediate sanction of President James Madison, who is called "the father of the Constitution." In his opinion no constitutional objection stood in the way. Certainly no latter-day statesman will deny the authority of Mr. Madison on constitutional construction, or believe that he would have sanctioned any violation of that instrument, even in the cause of charity. So the bill of 1847 met the prompt approval of President Polk, himself a strict constructionist and well versed in constitutional questions.

The Congress of the United States is the representative of the people of the United States. They are sent here to reflect and do the will of that people. There can be no doubt but that the charity and sympathy of the whole American people are deeply moved toward the unhappy people of Ireland, and your committee believe that in voting an appropriation for the relief of that people Congress will be carrying out the best wishes of the people of this Republic.

In the last place, is it politic to make this appropriation?

Certainly it should not interrupt, but rather cement the ties of friendship and affection that exist between our Government and that of Great Britain. The latter government cannot but appreciate the humanity that dictates this proposed action upon the part of our Government. It cannot be regarded as officious intermeddling, inasmuch as the cause of humanity and charity is the cause of the whole world. The divine injunction to move in charitable works is not limited by the lines of patriotism or the boundaries of empires.

By kindred associations and in the highest ethics we owe this aid to Ireland. Two centuries ago, when the colonies in Massachusetts were in a famishing condition, their wants were relieved by ship-loads of provisions sent from Ireland; and again, when our patriot soldiers in the struggle for our country's independence were lying half clad at Valley Forge, in that memorable winter when patriotic hopes were faintest, large supplies of clothing were received from the city of Cork. Irish sympathy in spite of threat and punishment contributed materially—who can say how materially—to the support and comfort of our soldiers in that critical period of our history. Irish statesmen have asserted that their parliament was destroyed in consequence of its clear, unhesitating, and unequivocal sympathy and expressions of affection with the struggling colonies; regarding America, in the words of Grattan, as the only hope of Ireland and the only refuge of the liberties of mankind. Without pausing to inquire if their assertion be true or not, it sufficiently indicates the warm affection of the Irish people toward us in our hour of need.

It is estimated that more than fifteen millions of the American people are either Irish or of Irish descent. The ties of blood and the associations of history that bind us to that people are so immediate and so great in number that we are almost one people. To Irishmen we owe gratitude for heroism on every field of battle where our flag has waved and where our troops have bled. To Irishmen we owe much of that learning, statesmanship, and eloquence which have rendered the American name famous throughout the world. To Irish industry we owe a very large proportion of those works of enterprise and civilization which are manifested in our railroads and canals, in the splendid structures of our cities, in the cleaving down of our forests, in the delivery to peaceful husbandry the wild soil of the wilderness, in the opening of our mines, and in all the works, and toils, and marches, and battles of American principles and progress against whatever foes these have had to encounter and to overthrow.

Your committee are, therefore, convinced of the propriety and the necessity for such relief by the Government of the United States to the people of Ireland, and they, therefore, report a substitute for House resolution No. 193, and recommend its passage.

As to the mode of distributing this appropriation there may be different opinions. Many organizations are engaged in this humane work. Your committee have concluded that the Department of State is the appropriate medium to execute the trust which the joint resolution reported creates, and the only limitation proposed on its action is that the principal societies organized for relief in Ireland shall be the recipients of the fund, so as to avoid unjust discrimination or prejudice, the grand end being to reach as soon as possible the greatest number of the needy and starving.

The sum of $300,000 may seem to some large, but it should be remembered that the occasion is urgent and the suffering is widespread. Our fathers thought in 1812, while we were but ten millions of people and involved in a vast and costly war, that $50,000 was not too much to send to the people of one city. Let it be remembered, too, that the people of that city, in origin, laws, and customs, had but little in common with the people of this country.

In 1847 the Senate of the United States thought that $500,000 was not too great a sum to send to starving Ireland, even though we were then engaged in a great war and in population and wealth were not half as great as we now are.

To-day we are at perfect peace. Heaven has vouchsafed us a great degree of national prosperity. The labors of our husbandmen have been blessed with bountiful harvests. We have an opulent surplus, beyond enough for our own wants. Peace and plenty sit smiling in our homes and upon our valleys and mountains and rivers.

Out of this abundance is it not benignant and right to give to the starving people of heroic and suffering Ireland? Is it not especially becoming our greatness and our power to give as a great and powerful people should give, not in boastful waste, not in injustice to our own interests, but in such a sum as shall assist our magnificent private benefactions, and go far toward relieving that awful calamity which has befallen this unhappy island, and which has attracted the sympathy and sorrow of mankind?

And then, on motion of Mr. CONGER, (at four o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Mackellar, Smiths & Jordan, James Conner's Sons, and Farmer, Little & Co., on behalf of the American type-founders, against the reduction of the duty on type—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Julia A. Ross, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. AINSLIE: Two petitions of F. E. Ensign, L. F. Carter, John Haily, and 342 citizens of Idaho, that Congress make some provision for the support and education of the three orphan children of William S. Hemmingway, late United States mail carrier, who was killed by Indians in 1878—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. NELSON W. ALDRICH: Memorial of J. P. Klinge, relating to the investigation of the affairs of the District of Columbia now being conducted by one of the committees of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of Augustus Watson, of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. ANDERSON: The petition of James C. Humphrey, publisher of the Belleville Telescope, Belleville, Kansas, for the abolition of the duty on type—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BAILEY: The petition of Ely Palmer and others, of Albany County, New York, that the patent laws be so amended as to make the manufacturer or vendor of patented articles alone responsible for infringement—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of Stephen Lawson and others, of Albany County, New York, that Congress enact such laws as will alleviate the oppressions imposed upon the people by the transportation monopolies that now control the interstate commerce of the country—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BARBER: The petition of Marshall Field, A. A. Sprague, J. W. Doane, and others, of Chicago, Illinois, for a commission to prepare a bankrupt law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of Marder, Luse & Co., type-founders of Chicago, Illinois, against the reduction of the duty on type—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of the soldiers' reunion of the Northwest, that the Secretary of War issue such arms and equipments as shall be needed at a soldiers' reunion to be held in Illinois in 1880—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of T. F. B. Harrison, of Wauconda, Illinois, for the removal of the stamp-tax on perfumery, cosmetics, and proprietary medicines—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BERRY: The petition of T. D. Clarkson, of California, that materials used in making paper be placed on the free list, and for a reduction of the duty on printing-paper—to the same committee.

By Mr. BICKNELL: The petitions of Jacob A. Horner, Anderson Routh, and 45 others, citizens of Indiana, for the adjustment and payment of the Morgan raid claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of Reuben Dailey, publisher of the National Democrat, Jeffersonville, Indiana, that materials used in making paper be placed on the free list, and for a reduction of the duty on printing-paper—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BLACKBURN: The petition of citizens of Woodford and Jessamine Counties, Kentucky, that Congress enact such laws as will alleviate the oppressions imposed upon the people by the transportation monopolies that now control the interstate commerce of the country—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky, praying for the erection of a United States court building at Frankfort, Kentucky—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, relative to the claim of the Kentucky soldiers of the war of 1861—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, relative to granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Jane W. McKee—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAKE: Joint resolution for the improvement of Passaic River in the State of New Jersey—to the Committee on Commerce.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 16, 1880.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., of Washington, D. C. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

QUORUM.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is evidently no quorum present. The Chair will delay a little until a quorum shall appear.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest that perhaps a call of the Senate would develop whether a quorum is present. By that time a quorum would no doubt be here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is clearly no quorum.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no quorum here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is apparent upon view, but at the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia the roll will be called. The Secretary called the roll and forty-one Senators answered to their names.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BALDWIN] is absent this morning on account of sickness.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A quorum is now present, and the presentation of petitions is in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. I have received concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York touching the need of certain lake improvements. These resolutions contain instructions to the Senators and Members from the State, but they also contain an expression of the opinion of the Legislature at large touching the matter to which they relate. I ask that they be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be reported.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK. IN ASSEMBLY,
February 11, 1880.

On motion of Mr. Ash:

Whereas the State of New York is interested, in common with other States bordering upon the great lakes, in the early completion of certain improvements, now in progress, affecting their commerce; and

Whereas, owing to the delay in the completion of these works, and especially the improvement of the channel between Lake Superior and Lake Huron, and of the Lime-Kiln Crossing, near the mouth of the Detroit River, the interchange of our products with the Northwest is now subject to great and needless disability and expense; and

Whereas the consequence of this falls upon our whole people, in the single particular of the non-products of Lake Superior, to the extent of nearly $1,000,000 annually; and

Whereas, by adequate appropriations therefor, the completion of the lock and canal at Sault Ste. Marie and the improvement of the Ste. Marie River and the Lime-Kiln Crossing can be completed to sixteen feet of water during the year 1881: Therefore,

Resolved, (if the senate concur,) That it is the sense of the Legislature of the State of New York that an urgent commercial necessity exists for the earliest possible completion of these improvements, and the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of New York are hereby requested to use all proper means to secure this important result.

Resolved, That a certified copy of these resolutions be forwarded to each of said Senators and Representatives.

By order.

EDWARD M. JOHNSON, Clerk.

IN SENATE, March 11, 1880.

Concurred in without amendment.
By order.

JOHN W. VROOMAN, Clerk.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, a uniform bankrupt law is in my opinion a necessity in this country. The necessity is more evident as the trade and commerce of the country increase. I thought it was an unwise thing to repeal the recent bankrupt law, and so said at the time it was done. It is true there were many provisions in that law which should have been eliminated from it, but the law should have been reconstructed—the good provisions saved and the bad provisions dropped out. There is a fast-growing public sentiment in the country at this time as to the necessity of a uniform bankrupt system which shall work justly both to creditor and debtor. I hold in my hand a petition upon the subject from merchants of the city of Chicago. I present the petition of Marshall Field (of Field, Leiter & Co.) and 41 merchants of Chicago, Illinois, praying for the appointment of a commission, composed in part at least of representative business men, to prepare for the consideration of Congress at the next session a form of bankrupt law that will work justly toward both creditor and debtor, and give to the country a uniform and permanent national bankrupt system. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I present the petition of 9 citizens of Marengo, Illinois, praying Congress to pass a law protecting the public against the fraud and imposition now extensively practiced of selling an article prepared from the oil of refuse fats for butter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What reference does the Senator desire?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not know to what committee the petition should go.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Inasmuch as a law of similar import about naphthas and oils has been held to be beyond the power of Congress by the Supreme Court, I suggest that the petition be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let it go to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is perfectly useless for Congress to do anything; of course we cannot do it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But the petition should be referred to a committee in order to get a report upon the power of Congress, and so settle the question.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Judiciary is the proper committee, for all subjects go to that committee that no other committee desires to have.

Mr. CONKLING. On the contrary, the Committee on Territories is the proper committee to consider this subject, I suggest to the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There have been several petitions on this subject presented. It seems to me that the petition ought properly to go to the Committee on Agriculture. They can report on the subject that the petitioners cannot get a remedy from Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to suggest that if there is any place in this country over which the constitutional power of Congress to legislate in this regard extends, it is the Territories; and having waited in vain for the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories to interpose the motion that I now do, I beg in his behalf or on my own to move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be reported by title. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] to it.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A memorial of 9 citizens of Marengo, Illinois, in favor of the passage of a law protecting the public against the fraud and imposition now extensively practiced of selling an article prepared from the oil of refuse fats for butter."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first question is, Shall the petition be referred to the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. GARLAND rose.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator from Arkansas makes his motion, I beg to suggest to him that although there may be doubt in the States as to the power of Congress to do this, there can be comparatively very little doubt as to the power of Congress in the Territories. Justly and laudably jealous as that honorable Senator is of the jurisdiction of his committee, I submit to him that here is a case where he is bound to interpose, and take this subject and make a report to Congress upon it.

Mr. GARLAND. As chairman of the Committee on Territories, I have very great pleasure in accepting the motion made by the Senator from New York; for the town of Marengo, Illinois, is known publicly and judicially to the Senate to be a mere territorial possession of the United States. [Laughter.] I think the Territorial Committee is the proper one.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have moved to refer the petition to the Committee on Agriculture.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, that the petition be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. [Putting the question.] The Chair thinks the yeas have it. The yeas have it. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the petition be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Captain Joseph Lawson, Third Cavalry, and other officers stationed at Fort Fred. Steele, Wyoming Territory, in regard to payment by officers for fuel; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of citizens of Lewis County, Kentucky, praying for the establishment of an ice-harbor at Vanceburgh in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the bar and business men of Paducah, Kentucky, praying for the construction of a suitable building in that city for a court-house, post-office, and customs and revenue offices; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented a petition of colored citizens of Kearneysville, West Virginia, praying that the unclaimed bounty of colored soldiers in the late war be used for the education of colored students, and that a portion of it be donated to Storer College, at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4439) to remove the disabilities of Sergeant P. P. Powell, Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3966) to carry into effect the resolution of Congress adopted on the 29th day of October, 1781, in regard to a monumental column at Yorktown, Virginia, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1058) for the relief of Walker A. Newton, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Ernst Hein, late corporal of Company C, Thirteenth Regiment Massachusetts Veteran Reserves, now a resident of Utica, Oneida County, New York, praying for an honorable discharge from the United States Army, and that the charge of desertion be removed from his military record, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1484) for the relief of Ernst Hein.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1035) for the regulation of the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia, and for the protection of the people of said District, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1239) granting a pension to Mrs. Kate E. Whiting, widow of Leonard J. Whiting, late second lieutenant Sixth Regiment Rhode Island Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WITHERS. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1381) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments. I will state that I am preparing and will submit for printing a report to accompany this bill.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 393) authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to refund to W. B. Farrar, of Whitfield County, Georgia, illegal taxes collected from him in the year 1877, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of Charles Clinton, to submit an adverse report thereon. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee, which will be printed.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was recommended the joint resolution (S. R. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell or lease to the Port Huron and Northwestern Railway Company a portion of the Fort Gratiot Military Reserve, and to authorize the city of Port Huron to grant to said railway company the right of way through Pine Grove Park, to report it with amendments. The joint resolution has been amended in accordance with the suggestion made in the Senate at the time of the recommitment.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1414) authorizing claimants to the Rancho de Napa, in Napa County, California, to prove up their title, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask leave without previous notice to introduce a bill to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the manner of counting the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

I will state to the Senate that for more than a year now there has existed a large select committee of this body charged with the duty of considering the subject named in this bill and other cognate subjects. So far as I know, that committee has had no meeting. I have waited, being in a minority in this body, in the hope that some gentleman in the majority would move in what I consider to be this most important business; but as no movement has been made I have felt it to be a duty to ask consent to introduce this bill and have it referred to that committee.

The bill that passed the Senate at the last session of the last Congress embraced various provisions as to the time of holding the election for presidential electors in the States, and various provisions better regulating the law in cases of vacancy in both the offices of President and Vice-President, and so on. The provisions of that bill as it passed the Senate, also looked to future legislation by the States in respect of providing the means of determining controversies in those States respecting the choice of electors. Time has so run that of course any provision of that kind which would apply to the next election of President and Vice-President of the United States, would be entirely useless.

In consequence of that, I have taken the bill that passed the Senate, and modified it to the simple proposition of providing that the meeting of the electors shall be on the second Monday in January, instead of as it is now on the first or second Wednesday of December. This is for the purpose of giving time in the respective States under such laws as the States may have provided (whether they exist now or shall be brought into existence before the election) to determine who their electors are, for according to the Constitution of the United States, as I believe and a majority of the Senate appear to have believed in passing the bill, of last year, the States have the sole power of determining who their electors are.

This bill, therefore, makes the simple provision for a State disposition of any controversy under such laws as it may have in existence prior to the day of choosing electors. It provides for a later meeting of the electors in order that each State may dispose of any controversy that shall arise, and then provides, as the bill of the last Congress did, for the meeting of the two Houses, and proceeding in conformity with the decisions reached in the respective States in any case of dispute.

I ask that the bill be twice read, and referred to the select committee on that subject.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1485) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Select Committee to take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the result of the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FERRY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1486) to reorganize and discipline the militia of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1487) to restore the lands included in the Fort Reading military reservation, in the State of California, to the public domain, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KIRKWOOD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1488) to provide for promotions in the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

VISIT TO EUROPEAN LIBRARIES.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 93) to enable Ainsworth R. Spofford, Librarian of Congress, to visit and inspect European public libraries; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That for the purpose of enabling Ainsworth R. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, to make arrangements for the more complete interchange of the publications by the Government of the United States and those of foreign nations, as well as to inspect the systems and methods under which public libraries in Europe are conducted and maintained, the sum of $2,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of Ainsworth R. Spofford in a visit to the libraries of Europe during the summer vacation of Congress for the purposes aforesaid, and that he make a report to Congress at its next session embodying such recommendations in regard to the Library of Congress as he may deem proper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I desire, if I may be permitted, before the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on the Library, to state my reasons for its introduction. It is wholly with a view to the public service.

The Congress of the United States by laws of remote date, and last by the act of July 25, 1838, provided for the delivery by the Congressional Printer of fifty copies of all books and other publications by the Government of the United States for the purpose of exchange with foreign governments for similar public documents. The system however for want of oversight and attention has worked very imperfectly. The foreign governments with whom the exchange list has been formed are some twenty-six in number, and of those the most voluminous receipts by the Library of Congress are so utterly irregular, as to destroy any value arising from their continuity and completeness.

The government of Great Britain sends but few or none of its publications to our Library, and that is simply owing to the fact that the details and machinery for making such exchange cannot be efficiently managed through the medium of mere epistolary correspondence. It will require the active supervision of an intelligent person to establish a practical system of proper exchange of these public documents in the manner designed by Congress, and it would be exceedingly useful and valuable to our Library.

In addition to the matter of the interchange of governmental publications there have been great improvements of which we should avail ourselves in the construction, supervision, classification, and arrangement of European libraries within the last twenty-five years. The very preservation of the books themselves, their methods of classification, arrangement, and cataloging, are all matters in which great advance has been made, the benefit of which I desire should accrue to our own Library.

The erection of a national library is every day becoming a matter of greater necessity. There is in this country no one whose intelligence and capacity to inform Congress properly upon this subject exceeds that of the modest, accomplished, and worthy gentleman who fills the post of Librarian so acceptably to all of those who have occasion to need his services or who are at all competent to judge of their value.

It is therefore, in my opinion, exceedingly proper and highly expedient that a visit to and an inspection of the public libraries of Europe should be made in behalf of the American people and their Library as soon as may be.

As I said, there is no one fitter for this mission nor who would more creditably represent the American Government than the gentleman named in this resolution. I may say, also as a matter which is not without weight with me, I think it would not only be a duty to him but a well-earned pleasure and delight. To make such a tour of inspection would be to Mr. Spofford a labor of love as well as the performance of a most important duty—a season of relaxation and release from very confining labors which his industry and devotion to public service have heretofore rendered impossible.

It is proper to add that except so far as the inquiry made by me into the irregular condition of our exchanges of governmental publications with those of foreign countries, Mr. Spofford has had no intimation whatever of the introduction of this joint resolution or of my intention to offer it. It has proceeded entirely on my own motion, after a comparison of views with several other gentlemen.

I make these remarks trusting that the proposition may commend itself to the favorable consideration of the Committee on the Library and of the Senate and to obtain their ready approval.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to say a word about the matter of exchanges. I believe that the system of exchanges is now regulated by law, and is consolidated in practice in the hands of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, where, if I am correctly advised, (not in reference to this question of course, but if my information and knowledge about it in general is correct) the system is as perfect and systematic as any such system can ever be. The United States exchange under the authority of law and through the Smithsonian Institution with every foreign government that is willing to reciprocate. Every single public document that is printed under the authority of Congress or at public expense, every valuable and important document that is printed in the Departments out of appropriations for the expenditures of those Departments and which are not printed by order of Congress in the direct sense so as to be distributed by Senators, and Representatives or of which Senators and Representatives, for public interests, can have even a single copy for their own inspection, is furnished to every foreign government regularly, systematically, at stated periods, as fast as they come forth, in just the degree that the foreign government is willing to reciprocate by furnishing the United States with its own documents and publications. That operation of international exchange produces a stream, and the only one that regularly and systematically could be produced to flow into the Library of Congress.

In addition to that, the Smithsonian Institution is authorized by its foundation under the acts of Congress to exchange publications of any kind that it makes itself or comes into possession of, with foreign and domestic literary societies, colleges, institutions in the United States and in foreign countries. That sends out from our workshop of intellect and progress the whole product of the nation, so to speak, and it brings back from every quarter of the globe the similar products of the intellect, and activity, and discovery, and progress, and social science, of all civilized peoples.

So I do not imagine that, as far as the mere subject of inspecting and arranging international exchanges of books is concerned, an expedition by anybody to a foreign country would be of any great service. In respect of the other part of it, the subject of inspecting libraries, classification, arrangement, and completing sets and all that sort of thing, there is very great force in what the Senator from Delaware has said; and I certainly should unite with him in all that he has said in respect of the capacity and worth of the gentleman named in the resolution.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to say one word on this subject before the joint resolution is referred. I wish to corroborate what has been so well said by the Senator from Vermont, in relation to the manner in which these exchanges are effected by the Smithsonian Institution. I am inclined to agree with the Senator that very little can be done in that direction, and if anything can be done, it should be by the Secretary of that institution. If this resolution is looking in the future to transfer the practical administration of that law from the Smithsonian Institution, where it is so well done, to the Library of Congress, where it cannot be as well done, I certainly hope it will not receive the consideration of this body. I have great fears that this is an entering-wedge to effect that change, and it would be a change which I think in its results would be injurious and disastrous.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Library.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4507) to abolish all tolls at the Louisville and Portland Canal; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 605) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

TENNESSEE RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate a statement from the books of the War Department showing in tabulated form the amounts appropriated and expended within fiscal and calendar years respectively for the improvement of the Tennessee River from 1870, and prior years, to the present date, and also showing the balances on June 30 of each year, and the balance, if any, now available.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. WITHERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 496) to provide for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS RECOMMENDED.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I rise to ask that some bills be taken from the Calendar and recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] who reported Senate bill No. 131, Senate bill No. 390, and Senate bill No. 965 from the Committee on Military Affairs, asks that they be recommended, and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the bills were recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

- A bill (S. No. 131) for the relief of John W. Chickering;
- A bill (S. No. 390) to authorize the President to restore Dunbar R. Ransom to his former rank in the Army; and
- A bill (S. No. 965) for the relief of D. T. Kirby.

CHARGES AGAINST SENATOR KELLOGG.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, on Friday last I offered a resolution of a personal nature, and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] I believe, gave notice that when the resolution came before the Senate for action he would move that it lie on the table. I desire to call up that resolution now, and I ask the Senate to dispose of it in some manner.

I wish also to state that I was actuated in offering the resolution by a feeling that the charge contained in the extract cited therein was without and beyond the usual category of newspaper publications reflecting upon members of this body. I felt that when a charge of that nature was made thus publicly against a member of this body it was his duty, in justice to himself, to call the attention of the Senate to it—no other than a charge that a member of this body had sought, by instigating a vile prosecution against another member of this body, to influence him in a matter that involved the discharge of his official duty. I felt that this was so extraordinary and unusual a charge as to justify me in pursuing the course that I did.

Moreover, when it came to my knowledge that simultaneous and contemporaneous publications of the same nature had been made connecting me with this matter; and furthermore, when I was informed by what I regarded as reliable authority, authority that I think cannot be successfully questioned, that a member of this body had stated to newspaper correspondents, if not to others, that this charge was substantially true, and connecting me directly with it, I felt that I was justified in pursuing the course that I did and repelling all attempts to connect me with this miserable business. Hence, last Friday, I took occasion to brand the instigators and authors, whoever they were, of the charge in a manner that I deemed proper and appropriate, and I think it was emphatic and unmistakable. I meant it to be so, at least.

Now, if for any reason a majority of the Senate see fit to refuse to adopt this resolution I am quite content. I only wished to place myself in such a position before the Senate as to indicate my willingness, nay, desire, that this matter should be investigated and the truth or falsity of the charge shown; and whatever course the Senate may take I may say that I shall consider that I have done all I am called on to do in any point of view in my own defense in respect to this entire matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana calls for the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on Friday last, which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the following appears in the New Orleans Democrat, a newspaper published in New Orleans, on the 9th day of March, 1880, purporting to be extracted from a newspaper called the Charleston News:

"It is well understood in Washington that the woman Jessie Raymond was carried there by W. P. KELLOGG, the carpet-bag Senator from Louisiana, and that he has been threatening for some time to have this suit brought unless Senator HILL would cease his efforts to have him (KELLOGG) unseated. The story of the seduction is not believed by those acquainted with the facts; and, even if it be true, resort to so dastardly a means to attain a political end can only recoil on the head of the concocter of the scheme."

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair who shall inquire and report concerning the truth of the charges and allegations in said article and the facts and circumstances connected therewith. Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a clerk and stenographer, and to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Louisiana has now made some statements that were not contained in his remarks last Friday. If they were, I did not hear them. I have not the RECORD before me, and I cannot say. As his remarks indicated, as the resolution itself indicates, the only source of these charges against him was certain newspapers. I said then, and I repeat now, that nothing in my judgment could tend more to degrade the American Senate, more to render it contemptible in the eyes of the people than for it to fall into the habit of appointing committees of investigation whenever some newspaper, responsible or irresponsible, sees fit to make some charge against a Senator.

Why, sir, when did the time ever exist that public men were not libeled in the public press; and what would be our condition and the condition of the public business if, instead of attending to that for which we were sent here, for which the Constitution ordained the existence of this body, our time was taken up in making inquiries into all the charges that appear anonymously or not anonymously in the public press.

If charges are made against a Senator by a responsible man in a responsible manner that ought to have the notice of this body, then ask for an inquiry; but to say that you are to roam over the tens of thousands of newspapers in the United States and find all the libels that are published against public men and against Senators, then summon senatorial committees to inquire of them to the great neglect of the public business, to the great expense of the Government, and, what is infinitely worse, to the utter degradation of the Senate, is what, Mr. President, during the brief time that I shall remain here, I never will consent to. No, sir. The laws furnish relief; if a man is libeled the law furnishes relief and a sufficient relief. The courts of law are open to Senators as well as to others who are libeled; and it does not become the Senate of the United States to turn itself into a nisi prius court to try all the libels that may be uttered against its members. Its own self-respect forbids it; the public interest forbids it; the dignity of the body, at least that dignity which the Constitution supposes it has should forbid it, and public morals forbid it.

Mr. President, I move that the resolution do lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken.

Mr. PLUMB. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Bailey,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Vance,
Bayard,	Groome,	Maxey,	Vest,
Beck,	Harris,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Call,	Hereford,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Johnston,	Pryor,	Wallace,
Coke,	Jonas,	Ransom,	Williams,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,	Withers.
Eaton,	Kernan,	Sater,
Garland,	McDonald,	Thurman,

NAYS—25.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Hoar,	Saunders,
Baldwin,	Davis of Illinois,	Kellogg,	Teller,
Blair,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Windom.
Booth,	Edmunds,	McMillan,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Morrill,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	Platt,

ABSENT—17.

Blaine,	Grover,	Lamar,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Hampton,	Logan,	Whyte.
Butler,	Hill of Georgia,	Paddock,
Carpenter,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Randolph,

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. EDMUNDS, of Vermont, are appointed as members of the Committee on Rules.

DISTRICT CRIMINAL PRACTICE.

Mr. THURMAN. I gave notice yesterday that I would ask the Senate in the morning hour to-day to take up a bill which I am sure will not occupy ten minutes, but which is of very pressing importance. I wish to state that as the law now stands there can be but one criminal court at the same time in this District, although there are judges at leisure and two criminal courts could be held at the same time. This bill is mainly to remedy that difficulty. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1408) to further amend the act entitled "An act to reorganize the courts of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and to repeal section 861 of chapter 24 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, and re-enact the same as amended.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, line 3, after the word "hereby," to strike out "repealed and re-enacted" and insert "amended so as to read."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 5, after the figures "861," to strike out:

No person who shall serve as a petit juror at any term of the criminal or circuit courts of the District of Columbia shall be eligible as a petit juror in either of said courts, or compellable to serve as a grand juror in the criminal court for the period of one year from the termination of such service.

And insert in lieu thereof:

It shall be good cause of principal challenge to any person called to serve as a talesman on a petit jury at any term of the criminal or circuit courts of the District of Columbia, that he has served as such juror in the trial of a cause in either of said courts at any time within one year next before his being so called and challenged.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 3. All laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are herewith repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest the necessity of amending the title so as to conform to the body of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title will be amended as suggested. The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to further amend the act entitled 'An act to reorganize the courts of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863, and to amend section 861 of chapter 24 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar of General Orders, commencing at the point reached yesterday.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call up a resolution I offered yesterday to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the consideration of a bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have submitted a resolution this morning affecting that question and I desire to have this go over until we get a response to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DENVER.

The bill (S. No. 1269) for the erection of a public building at Denver, Colorado, was announced as being first in order upon the Calendar, and its consideration was resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HILL, of Colorado, to strike out all of the bill after the word "States," in line 18, in the following words:

Nor until the State of Colorado shall duly release and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way assess said site or the property of the United States that may be thereon, and shall cede jurisdiction over the same during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I announced yesterday that in my opinion as far back as 1819, Judge Story had decided the question which lies at the bottom of this bill in accordance with the views, as I understood them, taken by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The bill is carrying out the power granted in article 1, section 8, clause 17, of the Constitution, though not comporting fully with the words or the entire ideas expressed in that clause. The clause is that Congress shall have power—

To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

This bill does not claim to get the assent of the Legislature of the State, or, more properly speaking, does not claim a cession from the Legislature of the State. It simply contemplates by the United States a purchase of this site. The authorities upon that section of the Constitution—and it has frequently been before the courts of the country—have divided the two powers and made a very distinct recognition of them as separate; first, a purchase by and under the cession of the State Legislature; second, a purchase without any cession at all. I presume that the Senator from Colorado who has control of the bill intended the bill to come under the latter power, or under the latter clause of the entire power; that is, the case of a simple purchase.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that the bill is not as introduced by any Senator from Colorado.

Mr. GARLAND. I beg pardon.

Mr. TELLER. At the early part of last session I introduced a bill for this purpose with this clause out; subsequently my colleague introduced a bill with it out; but the committee report this bill and make no disposition of either of the other bills.

Mr. GARLAND. I supposed the Senator's colleague had charge of it; but that does not matter.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask him one question before he proceeds, in order that I may understand him?

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Do I understand the Senator to say that there is a distinction in the jurisdiction that follows from a purchase by the consent of the Legislature of a State and that which exists where an actual cession of jurisdiction has been made? The Constitution, as I understand it, provides that the cession of jurisdiction shall be made only in the case of this District, and in all other cases the purchase is to be with the consent of the Legislature of the State wherein the land lies, and then the State need not give jurisdiction over that land unless it chooses. That is my understanding, but I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. GARLAND. The distinction is between a cession by the Legislature and a simple, naked purchase vesting the title in the Government of the United States. It is true that where a cession is made by the Legislature the exclusive jurisdiction follows and the State is ruled out as to the jurisdiction as to that particular piece of property. The incompatibility is just as marked and just as evident as it is in the philosophical problem that two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. I read from Paschal's Annotated Constitution, where the various cases on this subject are collected:

The right of exclusive legislation carries with it the right of exclusive jurisdiction, (United States vs. Cornell, 2 Mason, 60, 91; 6 Opin., 577,) even to recapture by military force, (2 Op., 521.) This second clause binds all the United States, (Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 224.)—Story's Constitution, section 1229.

Congress has the right to punish murder in a fort or other place within its exclusive jurisdiction, but no general right to punish murder committed within any of the States. (Idem.) The power to legislate in these places, ceded by a State, carries with it as an incident the right to make that power effectual. (Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 428.) Congress does not act as a local legislature, but exercises this particular power, like all other powers, in its high character as the Legislature of the Union. (Id., Story's Constitution, section 1234.) But the purchase of lands by the United States for public purposes, within the territorial limits of a State, does not of itself oust the jurisdiction or sovereignty of such State over the lands so purchased.

That is the decision in Cornell, in 2 Mason. This now is a mere purchase of land, as I understand this bill which is reported by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The Constitution prescribes the only mode by which they can acquire land as a sovereign power; and, therefore, they hold only as an individual when they obtain it in any other manner. (Commonwealth vs. Young, Brightly, 302; People vs. Godfrey, 17 Johns, 225; United States vs. Traver, 2 Wh. Cr. Cas., 490; People vs. Lent, Id., 548.) It seems, however, that the States have not the right to tax lands purchased by the United States for public purposes, although the consent of the Legislature may not have been given to the purchase.

That principle was decided by Judge Grier of the circuit court in a case in 2 Wallace, jr., and just upon that point.

The words moved to be stricken out by the Senator from Colorado, so far as concerns taxation, would be surplusage. It is not within the power of the State to tax these lands when purchased by the Government; so that part of the amendment of course is necessarily correct. It makes no difference what was provided in the enabling act by which Colorado was admitted into the Union, or in any other act; that power to tax does not exist. I will read from the decision in 2 Wallace, jr.:

After a cession by a State, it cannot take cognizance of any acts done in the ceded places after the cession. And the inhabitants of those places cease to be inhabitants of the State, and can no longer exercise any civil or political rights under the laws of the State. But if there has been no cession, the State jurisdiction still remains.

This bill, if I understand it, does not contemplate any cession; it simply contemplates a bare naked purchase of the land which under the decisions of the different courts that have construed this clause of the Constitution leaves the jurisdiction of the State intact.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I call the Senator's attention to the last clause, "and shall cede jurisdiction over the same during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof."

Mr. GARLAND. I am coming to that. I speak of the bill as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Colorado. If the amendment prevails, as a matter of course, that part of the bill will be stricken out; and it stands then simply as a purchase of property by the United States, and that leaves the jurisdiction of the State intact and unimpaired. If the amendment does not prevail, a cession will be required, the jurisdiction of the State will be wiped out. Which ever the Senators from Colorado prefer in this respect, I am perfectly willing to vote for.

Judge Kent, commenting on this power in a note to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, says:

The State governments may likewise lose all jurisdiction over places purchased by Congress, by the consent of the Legislature of the State, for the erection of forts, dock-yards, light-houses, hospitals, military academies, and other needful buildings. The question which has arisen on the subject was as to the effect of the proviso or reservation, usually annexed to the consent of the State, that all civil and criminal process issued under the authority of the State might be executed on the lands so ceded in like manner as if the cession had not been made. This point was much discussed in the circuit court of the United States in Rhode Island in the case of The United States vs. Cornell. It was held that a purchase of lands within the jurisdiction of a State, with the consent of the State, for the national purposes contemplated by the Constitution did, ipso facto, by the very terms of the Constitution, fall within the exclusive legislation of Congress and that the State jurisdiction was completely ousted. What, then, is the true intent and effect of the saving clause annexed to the cessions? It does not imply the reservation of any concurrent jurisdiction or legislation or that the State retained a right to punish for acts done within the ceded lands. The whole apparent object of the proviso was to prevent the ceded lands from becoming a sanctuary for fugitives from justice for acts done within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the State; and such permission to execute process is not incompatible with exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction. The acceptance of a cession with this reservation amounts to an agreement of the new sovereign to permit the free exercise of such process as being quoad hoc his own process. This construction has been frequently declared by the courts of the United States, and it comports entirely with the intention of the parties; and upon any other construction the cession would be nugatory and void. Judge Story doubted whether Congress were even at liberty by the terms of the Constitution to purchase lands with the consent of a State, under any qualification of that consent, which would deprive them of exclusive legislation over the place. The courts of the United States have sole and exclusive jurisdiction over an offense committed within a ceded place, notwithstanding the ordinary reservation of the right to execute civil and criminal process of the State. That was no reservation of any sovereignty or jurisdiction.

Congress, in exercising powers of exclusive legislation over a ceded place or district, unite the powers of general with those of local legislation. The power of local legislation carries with it, as an incident, the right to make that power effectual. Congress exercises that particular local power, like all its other powers, in its high character as the legislature of the Union, and its general power may come in aid of these local powers. It is, therefore, competent for Congress to try and punish an offender for an offense committed within one of those local districts, in a place not within such jurisdiction, or to provide for the pursuit and arrest of a criminal escaping from one of those districts after committing a felony there, or to punish a person for concealing, out of the district, a felony committed within it. All these incidental powers are necessary to the complete execution of the principal power, and the Supreme Court, in Cohens vs. Virginia, held that they were vested in Congress.

It follows, as a consequence, from this doctrine of the Federal courts, that State courts cannot take cognizance of any offenses committed within such ceded districts; and, on the other hand, that the inhabitants of such places cannot exercise any civil or political privileges under the laws of the State, because they are not bound by those laws. This has been so decided in the State courts.

Reference is made to an opinion of Mr. Justice Woodbury in the case of The Commonwealth vs. Clary, 8 Mass., 72; and to Same vs. Young, 1 Hall's Journal of Jurisprudence, 53:

But if in any case the United States have not actually purchased, and the State has not, in point of fact, ceded, the place or territory to the United States, its jurisdiction remains, notwithstanding the place may have been occupied ever since its surrender by Great Britain by the troops of the United States as a fort or garrison. The supreme court of New York accordingly held, in the case of The People vs. Godfrey, that they had jurisdiction of a murder committed by one soldier upon another within Niagara Fort. Nor would the purchase of the land by the United States be alone sufficient to vest them with the jurisdiction, or to oust that of the State, without being accompanied or followed with the consent of the Legislature of the State. This was so decided in the case of The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania vs. Young.

I prefer to read from Judge Kent, because he summarizes the different decisions. The last clause I have read covers the case of this bill precisely:

Nor would the purchase of the land by the United States be alone sufficient to vest them with the jurisdiction or to oust that of the State, without being accompanied or followed with the consent of the Legislature of the State.

It stands as a simple purchase on the face of this bill with the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, leaving the State jurisdiction as it was before. If that is the wish of the Senators from Colorado, the amendment accomplishes that end. The clause of the bill in reference to taxation which the amendment strikes out is, as I said before, unnecessary. The property cannot be taxed anyway. The amendment offered by the other Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is unnecessary, because by the act of 1841 no money can be appropriated to carry on these buildings until the title is examined by the Attorney-General and pronounced sufficient, and that general law is not repealed by this special law as to this building in Colorado.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, this question, in my opinion, lies within a very narrow compass. The bill as reported from the committee contains a clause which provides for the cession of jurisdiction on the part of the State over the locality upon which it is proposed to erect a public building. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL,] in whose State it is proposed to erect this structure, is to strike out that clause and to leave the bill without any provision whatever looking to a cession of jurisdiction over the ground on the part of the State that he represents. I said the other day that this matter was considered by the committee of which I happen to be chairman, and I am anxious that some principle should be adopted which will regulate cases like this hereafter.

I do not think it is necessary, even if jurisdiction is required, that this bill shall stand in its present shape, because according to the authority read by the Senator from Arkansas consent on the part of the Legislature to the purchase vests jurisdiction over the land the same as a cession by the Legislature. There cannot be any doubt about that. There are two ways of acquiring exclusive jurisdiction over ground like this. The first is by a cession on the part of the State, in which she relinquishes all sovereign authority over it, and thereby vests in the Government of the Union exclusive jurisdiction over the ground. The next method is by a purchase on the part of the United States with the consent of the Legislature of the State within which the land lies. Either of these methods will result in vesting jurisdiction in the Government of the United States.

Now, I say it is not necessary, even if jurisdiction is desired, that this bill should stand in its present form; that is, providing for a cession on the part of the State of jurisdiction to the United States; but even leaving that out, and letting the bill pass in the form in which the Senator from Colorado desires it to pass, after that if it is thought wise and expedient to obtain this jurisdiction over the ground, an act on the part of the Legislature of Colorado consenting to the purchase will carry with it the precise consequences that would follow from an actual cession. He has stated his reasons for wishing to leave this clause out. It may be necessary to go on with the work before the Legislature meets, and if jurisdiction is desired afterward all that is necessary would be for the State to signify its assent to the purchase, and thereby vest authority in the Government of the Union.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. TELLER and others. Let us vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senate will allow this bill to be disposed of. It will take but a moment longer.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is no objection to a vote, but there is to discussion.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest as a compromise on all sides of the question, that we strike out of the bill—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senate consent to the further consideration of this bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL. On line 18, after the word "States," I suggest that we strike out the whole to the end of the bill, and insert what I send to the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The words will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "States," in line 18, it is proposed to strike out all the remainder of the bill, as follows:

Nor until the State of Colorado shall duly release and relinquish to the United States the right to tax, or in any way assess, said site or property of the United States that may be thereon, and shall cede jurisdiction over the same during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Nor until the Legislature of the State of Colorado shall duly consent to the purchase by the United States of the proposed site.

Mr. MORRILL. I think it has become very obvious, upon the reading of the Constitution and the various comments which have been made, that the United States will have jurisdiction over any property that the State Legislature consents to part with to the United States; and, also, that it will be impossible for any State to tax the property of the United States. Therefore, I suggest the amendment which I have proposed, and I think all parties will be satisfied.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me, if I understand anything about the law governing this case, that this amendment amounts to about the same as the present provision. I do not see that we gain anything by it.

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to say one word to my friend from Vermont. His amendment will not do at all, I beg leave to say to him. Wherever the Legislature of a State consents to the purchase, then the Constitution itself provides that the jurisdiction of Congress shall be exclusive. The Constitution operates proprio vigore, and the moment the purchase is made by the consent of the State, it requires no cession of jurisdiction on the part of the State. The Constitution of the United States itself operates to give Congress exclusive jurisdiction. The striking out part of the amendment is well enough, but what the Senator from Vermont proposes to insert makes the bill just as bad as it now is.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not desire to have this bill take up all the time of the morning; but certainly I never will consent to a proposition that we shall not have the assent of the State to any purchase that shall be made. I think it will be going a great way to say that the United States may put up a building wherever it pleases, without the consent of the Legislature of the State, especially when it is expressly provided in the Constitution that consent shall be obtained.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This single case is made now to involve a very general principle of policy, and will undoubtedly be a test and a solution of whatever in future is to be the policy of the United States. It therefore having broadened itself, out of the theory of the Anthony rule, I object to its further consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to reconsider the vote by which the memorial relating to the adulteration of butter was referred this morning to the Committee on Territories, and ask that the memorial go to the Committee on Agriculture. It is more agreeable to the Senator who presented the memorial, I learn, that it should go to the Committee on Agriculture than to the other committee. Some other similar petitions have gone there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PLATT in the chair.) If there be no objection it will be so ordered, and the memorial will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4507) to abolish all tolls at the Louisville and Portland Canal was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MAIL-TRANSPORTATION DEFICIENCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. WALLACE on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, in section 1, line 3, to strike out "nine hundred and seventy" and insert "eleven hundred."

Mr. WALLACE. I desire to give notice that I want to finish this bill to-day, and I hope the Senate will stay and finish it.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I agree with the chairman of the subcommittee who has charge of this bill, [Mr. WALLACE,] that it is important to finish it to-day, and I will endeavor to consume as little time as I can consistently with a full presentation of what I think ought to be said in behalf particularly of the truth of the statements contained in the preamble reported by the Committee on Appropriations as part of the bill.

Yesterday I endeavored to show as well as I could that the Post-Office Department had disregarded the provisions of the statutes of the United States which provide that no money shall be expended during any one fiscal year by any Department of the Government in excess of appropriations and that no contract shall be made which shall bind the Government for any sum in excess thereof, which is all the preamble alleges.

It was made apparent by the statement of the Postmaster-General and of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to the subcommittee that they had so used the appropriations made for the star service as necessarily to create a deficiency which they claimed would amount to $1,720,004. They had made contracts extending over the whole year and for years yet to come to that extent in excess of all appropriations. The question therefore had to be met by the Committee on Appropriations and it must be decided by the Congress of the United States whether the Postmaster-General and his officials have a right to violate the law, to exceed appropriations made by Congress, to make contracts in violation of the provisions of the statutes, or whether Congress has power over these things and a right to rebuke offending officials.

I am not going to repeat any of the arguments I made on that subject. The statement of the proposition seems to me to exhaust the argument. If the Post-Office Department officials have a right to expend in one month, two months, six months, or nine months what they estimate as necessary for the existing and probable service for a whole year, and then by an edict such as was issued on the 20th of February cut down all the star mail service of the United States from daily to weekly trips on and after the 1st day of March unless they can coerce Congress to give them whatever additional money they see fit to demand, there is no use for Congress in matters of appropriation. The Department is master of the situation, as I fear it will be through the power and patronage it wields. I said that if they had created deficiencies by accident or unintentionally, and had said so to us, that might be excusable; but when we are told defiantly that it is their right to do so, and that we are stopping the mail service of the United States by refusing to furnish the money they now demand, then it is time the issue should be made and met.

It will be recollected that I said yesterday that every dollar the Department demanded for the service was given to them. Congress was in session up to the 2d day of July, 1879, and if they had anticipated any deficiency and had sought to deal fairly it was their duty then to have told us and allowed us to provide for it.

None of these things were done. Now complaint is made that we are seeking to prejudice the legality of their action and to find men guilty by asserting in the preamble that they have violated the laws, without a hearing. Mr. President, a thousand witnesses might be called to prove the facts and they could not prove them more conclusively than the Postmaster-General and his Second Assistant have proved them themselves. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate differed somewhat from the Committee on Appropriations of the House as to the best mode of redress. The House bill as it came to us sought to cut down certain mail service. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate ask the Senate not to cut down any of the service, but to rebuke our own officials.

The House sought to censure the Department because of illegal acts by cutting down the contracts on routes on which there had been large expedition of the service. That was the remedy they proposed. The Senate Committee on Appropriations propose not to investigate that question at present, but to allow the routes to remain as they are, to allow the expedition to remain as it is, to provide for all the service on all the routes, and give all the money that the books show to be necessary.

Both committees acted upon the obvious fact that there has been a disregard by the Post-Office Department of existing laws by the expenditure of money in excess of appropriations and by making contracts in violation of their obligations. It is no argument to my mind to say that they can annul all these contracts and stop mail service now without expending more than the money actually given. To do that they have to pay $600,000, taken out of the Treasury of the United States, to cover up their own wrongs in order to prevent them from being guilty of impeachable offenses. Mr. President, did you ever hear of a man who violated the law going into the Treasury of the country and taking out money to protect himself from the law he had violated, taking $600,000 to pay his friends for nothing, and then defying the Congress of the United States to say aught against him and defending himself by saying, "I have stopped your mails; I have made you pay $600,000 to save me from technically going beyond the appropriations you allowed me?" I confess that I can hardly argue the question or restate it because of the absurdity of the proposition. The statement, as I said, exhausts the argument.

See the effect of such conduct: not only the one hundred and seven routes which the House sought to cut down are destroyed by the order of the Postmaster-General, of February 20, but 10,400 routes were cut down to weekly service, the object being to put additional coercion on Congress. And as we had authorized some new routes last year, he says, in his circular of February 20, after cutting down all the existing routes from daily to weekly service, that he will stop altogether all new routes. He knew that every member of Congress would be written to by his constituents to know why their mail-route is stopped. The daily mails were put on by him, as he admits, on the routes appropriated for because the service required it, and now he says he will cut them down to punish members of Congress for failing to obey his orders and give him all the money he demands. He orders that to take effect on the 1st day of March, fifteen days ago, but he graciously concluded to suspend his order temporarily to see if he could not coerce us to give him the money demanded. I admit the coercion; I admit the duress. I agree to give the money, but I insist that we shall not give it to that Department until we have told the Department that they were wrong-doers in forcing that condition of things upon us. I presume I will be beaten, but no matter.

The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate agreed that, pending the investigation in the House of Representatives, it was well not to pass judgment in advance as to the contracts alleged to be fraudulent. We are seeking to refrain from passing judgment upon any question of fraud. We have simply passed upon the violation of the law by our own officials, which is admitted, unless the theory of the Postmaster-General and of those who agree with him shall prevail, which never ought to be indorsed in this or any other deliberative representative body.

I said yesterday that I would call attention to the reasons which induced the passage of the laws under which we are now conducting public affairs which bind the Postmaster-General and every other head of the Departments of this Government. During the war, for example, immense appropriations were made by Congress, and at the close of it an immense amount of surplus money appropriated was on hand in the various Departments; immense amounts of materials, such as horses, mules, wagons, all the materials of war, all the ships temporarily built or bought for the Navy; and of all the great items of expenditures large balances were in the Treasury charged to the Departments, and no longer considered as part of the money or property of the people.

What did they do? They claimed that all the money appropriated for the use of each Department belonged to that Department, and could be used to pay any or all the so-called debts of the Department. The appropriation having been charged to them during former years, they claimed that it remained subject to their control. It never appeared as part of the public debt statement, or as part of the public assets, except when it was first appropriated; and whatever balance remained unexpended or unsold the Departments claimed the right to use as they saw fit. For example, for the fiscal year 1866, beginning the 1st July, 1865, and ending June 30, 1866, there was an appropriation made for the Army of $283,000,000. The war closed before that fiscal year began, and much of the money appropriated, amounting as I said to $283,000,000, which was supposed to be necessary for war purposes was not needed. The act referred to was passed on the 3d March, 1865, when the war was flagrant. Among the other items of that bill, which I hold in my hand, (see volume 13, Statutes at Large, page 495,) was this:

For pay of volunteers, $300,000,000.

And large appropriations were made for the purchase of horses, mules, wagons, &c. Instead of using any of these sums of money to pay volunteers or buy wagons, mules, or other munitions of war, the Government, the moment the war closed, in May, 1865, began to sell, and to sell largely, the vast accumulations of material on hand; yet it was claimed that as the War Department had been charged with that $283,000,000, it lay subject to their order; that it could be drawn upon for whatever they saw fit to use it for. The Navy Department did the same thing, and both Departments used it recklessly, as I have in years gone by had occasion to show more than once at the other end of the Capitol.

In 1870, as I said yesterday, when the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, of which I was an humble member, all these things were brought before us and carefully considered. During the years before that there was some excuse, perhaps, for looseness in management. I am not going to revive the old political troubles and the strife we then had over those questions; but the fact is known that during President Johnson's administration Congress and the President were at loggerheads; they did not work harmoniously. The President sent to the Senate appointments for official positions, of which over eleven hundred were rejected by the Senate in two years—over fourteen hundred, including those that were allowed to lie over and die. Nothing worked well; the internal revenue was not collected, and there seemed to be no responsibility anywhere. But in 1870, when the President and the Congress began to work in unison, these great evils were brought before the Committee on Appropriations, and then it was, on the 12th of July, 1870, that we passed these wholesome laws by adding seven sections to the executive, legislative, and judicial appropriation bill, one of which was literally transcribed into the Revised Statutes, and reads as follows—I repeat reading it, though I believe I read it twice yesterday:

That it shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or to involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

And we provided that all balances of appropriations which remained on the books of the Treasury that had not been drawn against for the accounts of that year should be paid back into the Treasury, and that these sums should no longer remain indefinitely to the credit or subject to the order of the different Departments. We went a step further afterward, May 8, 1872, when we required all sales of property that were made by any officer or Department of the Government to be paid into the Treasury and a list of the articles sold and the prices paid to be given, and they to be furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual statements to Congress, so that Congress could know what was being done with the money of the people, and investigate any wrongs that might appear in any of the accounts.

We provided still further that when we gave money to be used for one branch of the public service to any Department, or any bureau thereof, it should not be transferred to any other bureau or branch of service in the Department, but should be accounted for separately, just as the appropriations for the railroad routes, the steamboat routes, and the star mail routes have to be accounted for now in the Post-Office Department, not mixing them up one with the other. All these precautions were taken for the purpose of giving us intelligent information upon the subject of expenditures and of keeping them within our control. The Departments struggled against these laws year after year and sought to get rid of them. They have been retained by Congress and adhered to as the only means that we had of keeping control over the public money. As I said yesterday, this is the first time we have been openly defied. I hold in my hand a specimen of how the money used to be expended before these laws were passed. I introduced a resolution into the House of Representatives and had it passed calling upon the then Secretary of War, General

Belknap, in 1872, to give us information as to the amount of money that had been received for property sold by that Department in the five or six years preceding, and what had been done with it. Strong objection was made to giving the desired information. The answer came back that it could not be done in less than six months. We resisted the passage of the Army bill until it was done. It came at last; and this is the closing sentence of the report of the Quartermaster-General. After showing the large amounts that had been received, giving the figures in detail, the Acting Quartermaster-General says, and it is the key to the whole of it:

Making the total amount received by this Department since June 30, 1865, in excess of its appropriations, $107,950,416.62. All of this has been used in payment of indebtedness of the Department except, as before stated, the sum of $2,777,807.64.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT ALLEN,

Acting Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General United States Army.
The Honorable SECRETARY OF WAR.

One hundred and five millions of dollars used by the Quartermaster's Department alone in excess of the appropriations made by Congress, and spent by that officer to pay the debts of the Department, as he saw fit to call them! That one hundred and seven millions never appeared as part of the money of the people from the day it was appropriated during the war to buy the cattle, mules, horses, wagons, and other things that were afterward sold to produce it, but it remained standing as money belonging to the Department till paid out to suit themselves. So the Secretary of the Navy made a like report in 1872, showing that $74,000,000 had been received from the sale of ships and other material by his Department.

These are specimens of the things that induced us to pass the various laws now on the statute-books requiring executive officers to obey Congress, and we have been endeavoring to maintain them from that time to this; and it is obvious unless we continue to do so there is no security that the public money will ever be properly cared for or honestly expended. If the Postmaster-General can defy us, if he can say, "True, you gave me all I asked; true, I estimated for 10,400 existing routes, and a reasonable increase of service, and agreed to maintain them during the whole year with the $5,900,000 you gave, and I made contracts with that view, but I have changed my mind; I have concluded to build up routes elsewhere, and I will divert a million and a half or two million dollars of that money from these purposes to other purposes, and spend it all as I please, and close your mails if you refuse to comply with my demand for more money. I will coerce it out of you, or punish your people, and punish you through your people, because you refuse to obey my orders." If this can be done, what is the value of all the laws we have passed and have struggled so long and so hard to maintain in the interest of honesty and economy? To indorse the action of the Postmaster-General in this regard on any pretext however plausible will be understood by the people everywhere as deliberately returning to the old bad system that we so long sought to remedy and that we have in great part remedied; and shall not this Congress, when an appropriation is thus forced out of it—against its will, if you please, certainly against right—say that while it will not punish the people, while it will furnish all the necessary mail service, it will rebuke the officers of the Government who dare thus wantonly, willfully, and deliberately, as they say they have done, to violate the law, disregard their obligations, and force that condition of things upon Congress? That is the effort being made by the Committee on Appropriations now. The Senate may not sustain us; but it will be the worst day's work the Senate ever did if it gives license again to executive officers to restore the old bad condition of things that after years of struggle was supposed to have been remedied by the laws to which I have called attention. I have hoped much from the honesty and economy of the democratic party. This is a fair test of the sincerity of its professions in that regard. A few words on another subject.

The way in which the money appropriated has been expended needs a passing remark. I made a few notes on that subject by which I can refer to the testimony hurriedly without detaining the Senate long. In the demand of the Postmaster-General made upon us in December, and in the demand of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, made at the same time, they asked us to give them $2,000,000 out of the unexpended balances of money given them in former years. That has been the cry all the time from all the executive officials. All the Departments say, "We do not ask for money out of the Treasury; we ask for unexpended balances," as though the money that was unexpended in former years is not as much the money of the people as any other money in the Treasury of the United States. Before we passed these laws, when the War Department and the Navy Department demanded more money, they said, "We do not ask you for any money out of the Treasury; we ask you for the unexpended balances of our old appropriations." Unexpended balance of what? The former appropriations were given when Congress supposed great exigencies existed; those exigencies having passed away, leaving money unexpended or munitions of war which they had left on hand and sold. The proceeds of these sales were as much the money of the people as any other money the people had contributed by taxation to the Treasury. So with the money given in former years to the Post-Office and remaining unexpended; it is part of the money of the people.

Still the Post-Office Department is clamoring again for unexpended balances of money that were returned to the Treasury two or three years ago, which they could not have spent without violating the law, and did not spend; but they now demand it almost as a matter of right. That by the way. The expedition of the mail routes alluded to yesterday by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] has been the great source of extravagant expenditure. I am not going over many of them; time and the patience of the Senate would fail me; but I am entirely willing to take up as a specimen the great route that he spoke of from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma, about which so much of his speech was made, and show that that was an unwarrantable and unnecessary use of the public money, especially if the other routes of the country had to be deprived of their service in order to pay for that expedition. From Fort Worth to Fort Yuma the advertised distance—

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to say that the increase of the Fort Worth route was estimated for, as he will see by examination?

Mr. BECK. It was for this current fiscal year, not for last year, but it is a fair illustration of many of the others. I refer to it as a specimen of the management of the Post-Office Department in these matters, as it was selected and specially lauded by the other Senator from Texas. It was advertised as being fifteen hundred and sixty-nine miles in length from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma. It was let for four years at $134,000 a year. The schedule time was seventeen days and the number of post-offices along the route when let was thirty-five. The route is now called fourteen hundred and twenty-six miles, and my information is, though the Senators from Texas will doubtless differ with me as to that, that the advertised length was not the proper length. It never was any longer than fourteen hundred and twenty-six miles, if that long. I applied to the Post-Office Department for information on the subject but was unable to obtain it—I then took the next best means to find out from the old contractors, and in the guide-books I find this condition of things: I have the advertisement of the length of lines of the various contractors, and the distances as follows: From Fort Worth to Fort Concho, 239 miles; from Fort Concho to Missoula, 526 miles; from Missoula to Yuma, 645 miles; total, 1,410 miles.

That is what these men advertise as the length of that line. It was advertised by the Department as 1,569, and it is now put down at 1,426 in the Post-Office official tables, while the advertisement of the contractors shows it to be 1,410. It was an old route which had been let in former years. Its length was known. It was let at a higher schedule for the term ending the 30th of June, 1878, than it was let for the term beginning 1st of July, 1878. When it was let for the last four years the extended time doubtless induced persons to bid a lower rate, and therefore it was let at $134,000 a year from July, 1878, till July, 1882, less, considerably less, than it had been let for before. In exactly forty-five days, I think, on the 15th of August, after the second letting in 1878, without adding an additional trip, putting on but few additional coaches, I presume, certainly without adding an additional trip, $165,000 was given to the contractor for expediting the time from seventeen days to thirteen days. No more post-offices had been established, it will be observed, with a single exception. There are thirty-six now, and there were thirty-five in July, 1878. One hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars were added to the $134,000 contracted for without a single additional mail being carried, and going only about a mile faster time per hour. Of course, a few such donations or favors as that will soon create deficiencies in the other star routes of the country.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] said yesterday that it was done on the representation of a great many men and at the request of men of power, influence, and position. Of course it was. Contractors easily work up petitions and everybody signs them. There never was a route in the country where men all along the line would not petition to have as many mail facilities as possible. The Senator from Texas read his own letter, and I was struck with the reading of it. It was an honest, fair statement of the case; but what was the case? Senator MAXEY said on the 22d of July, 1878—that was only twenty-two days after a bidder had taken the contract for $134,000 a year for four years, and had given $135,000 security with good bondsmen that he would carry it for four years at that rate; the United States was getting its daily mail carried upon it—Senator MAXEY asked Mr. Key, as he read himself yesterday, for expedition on the route. What does he say?

I believe the time should be expedited for two reasons: First, I think it necessary to maintain service on this great and important line, which, if not broken down at present rates, will be apt to materially damage the contractors; second, I believe the increasing needs of this rapidly developing country not only justify, but, in my judgment, make it the duty of the Department to put this great line on a solid basis at reasonably remunerative rates to the contractors.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. B. MAXEY.

He wants more remunerative rates for the contractors. The contractors, however, bid for it at $134,000. They had given bonds to carry it for $134,000. There was no proposition to give to the people along the line any more mails than they were getting at the $134,000, which the contractors had covenanted to furnish for four years for $134,000 a year, and yet the Senator from Texas says it is not only right and proper, but he reads other letters, many of them like his own, insisting upon giving these men more remunerative rates, and the Postmaster-General gives them $165,000 more merely to expedite the time, without competitive bids, and without giving anybody a chance to perform the service for less money. Of course it was gratifying to Mr. Key, in looking over these lists of letters, to see such as this signed by a large number of officials. It is duplicated, perhaps, with another name or two, from other places, to give it emphasis:

Hon. D. M. Key, Postmaster-General United States:

We, the subscribers, being citizens and officials in Brown County, Texas, heartily and sincerely congratulate the Postmaster-General of the United States for his promptness and exceedingly valuable action in giving this portion of our country the "fast overland mail line" from Fort Worth, Texas, to Fort Yuma, Arizona. This, the longest and fastest horse mail-route in the world, of fifteen hundred and sixty miles in thirteen days with coaches, will long stand as a monument in honor of its author's enterprise and energy.

It was a grand boast. The longest and fastest route in the world. Yet the poor men in the West are getting nothing—so says the Senator from Texas. Here was a route contracted for at $134,000; a daily mail was being delivered, its delivery secured by bonds; but in order to make a grand monument to Mr. Key's energy and enterprise, he rewards contractors; admiring friends telegraph to him that the people there are delighted to have the fastest and longest route in the world and $165,000 are to be taken out of the Treasury, and the mails in other States are to be stopped or reduced from daily to weekly service in order to enable him to receive the plaudits of these people for his energy and enterprise! That may be all very well. If I lived in Texas, especially if I lived along that line, I would have asked for it too; I would have begged for it very likely, and so would we all, but we do not appoint public servants for the purpose of yielding to such appeals, or authorize them to destroy needful service elsewhere in order to receive congratulatory telegrams.

Mr. COKE. The Senator should remember that Congress appropriated $290,000 for that specific route. It was included in the estimates on which the appropriation in the regular bill was made.

Mr. BECK. Oh, yes; it was in the appropriation bill because that was done in 1878.

Mr. COKE. So the establishment of that route did not necessitate the stoppage of other routes to which the Senator alluded just now.

Mr. BECK. This particular route this particular year did not make a deficiency for this year. I have said that before. But I will take another route as a pretty good specimen of extravagance, that from Prescott to Santa Fé. First let me show another thing in regard to the Fort Yuma route. The railroad from Fort Yuma eastward is finished to-day to Tucson. I read an extract which was cut from a paper the other day:

PROGRESS OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

END OF TRACK S. P. R. R.,
Arizona, February 26, 1880.

Average daily laying of track, last twenty-five working days, ten thousand feet. End of track, forty-six and one-half miles east of former terminus at Casa Grande, or two hundred and twenty-eight miles east of Yuma, and nine hundred and fifty-nine miles east of San Francisco, now within twenty miles of Tucson, which we hope to reach by March 15.

J. H. STROBRIDGE,
Chief of Construction.

Tucson, I understand, is about three hundred miles east of Yuma. The Senator from Texas knows whether that is substantially correct or not. I have the map before me, and it seems to lie about halfway between Yuma and the Rio Grande, and about three hundred miles east of Yuma. On all the contracts for star routes one of the grounds the Post-Office Department has for taking off star service, by shortening time and securing expedition, is that when a railroad is built alongside the route, they stop it at the terminus of the railroad and give the service to the railroad company. Why? Because the railroad can perform that three hundred miles of service in half a day, and it shortens the star route that much. What was done upon this route? Mr. Brady, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, is asked about it, as follows:

Question. Who is the contractor on the Fort Worth and Yuma route?

Answer. Mr. Chidester, of Arkansas.

Q. Is that a sublet contract?

A. Mr. Chidester himself has stocked the road and carries the mail from Fort Worth to Fort Concho.

That is two hundred and thirty-nine miles, I think, by the postal guide.

Between Concho and El Paso, and between El Paso and Yuma, the work is done by sub-contractors and by the railroad company. I have been trying to get the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to carry the mail for the Department from the point where the route strikes their line, but they will not do it. They prefer to carry it for the contractor, because the contractor can afford to pay the railroad company more than we can pay the company under the rule of weight of mail; and Mr. Huntington says that so long as he can get more money from the contractor for carrying the mails he will not carry them for the Department, and there is no law to compel him to do so.

What is the meaning of all that? The $300,000 is paid for the whole route, $164,000 of it for expedition. Huntington is furnishing more expedition a good deal than the coaches, and he wants and demands for his three hundred miles his full share of that $300,000, and he will not carry the mail on any other terms, while other people are getting that much money, and he tells the Postmaster-General that as long as he can get more money from the contractor for carrying the mails, he will not carry them for the United States, and instead of stopping that route now, as they do wherever a railroad taps a stage line, and cutting off that much of the line, they are paying and continuing to pay under that contract $299,000 for the whole route to Yuma, and Mr. Huntington is getting his share of it and tells the Postmaster-General that he gets more from the contractor than the Government would pay him under its rule, and therefore he will not carry it for the Government as long as he can do that. Of course he will not. Nobody else would.

Understand me, I am not finding fault with the contractors. It is the business of the contractor to get all he can. It is the duty of the Government officials to see that the Government is not cheated. There can be no fraudulent contractor without a fraudulent Government official. I am not seeking to deal with the contractors or to charge frauds upon them. I am dealing with Government officials; and when I insist as I do that they are not regardless of the public interest and not doing their duty, I look to the head of the Department, who is himself, as I said yesterday, an honest man, but is in my judgment in the hands of men who use him as their clerk, instead of their being his clerks; and as regards many of these money-making jobs, I think that he knows very little more about how these things are done in his Department than I do who never had anything to do with it.

I started to refer to the route from Prescott to Santa Fé, a new route. Let me call attention to that and show a little of the history of it. That route was let to a man by the name of McDonough for $13,313 a year. There were to be three trips made each week. The length of the route is stated at four hundred and sixty miles. Mr. McDonough sublet the route to a man by the name of John A. Walsh, now a banker in the city of Washington. Mr. Walsh so managed that route as sub-contractor, so failed to deliver his mail after there had been $74,000 added for additional trips, that the Post-Office Department declared McDonough a failing contractor. They said they could not deal with the sub-contractor, although the sub-contractor was the man who caused the failure, was the man who failed to deliver the mail, the man who had the sole charge of the business. Walsh was the sub-contractor; yet McDonough was declared to be a failing contractor. Walsh was not held responsible. What happened?

The Department struck down the pay from $74,000 to $13,313 and said to the sureties of McDonough, "If you want to take this route again at $13,313 you can have it." The Department had said the necessity of the service required it to be increased until they paid $74,000; but the moment McDonough was declared a failing contractor, although the necessities of the service required $74,000 to be paid, they struck it down to $13,313 and said to the sureties of McDonough, "You can take it at that." These men had no facilities; they had no horses, no stages, or other material on hand; and they could not take it. What then did the Department do? They let it at once to Mr. Walsh for $18,500, being just below the next lowest bidder to McDonough. Recollect Walsh was the man who caused the failure of the service. What did they do then? As soon as he got it they declared that the route had to be expedited and they added $64,000 to the $74,000, and they paid him $136,975 a year for the route that McDonough undertook to run for $13,313, and that he, as a sub-contractor, broke down on in order to get it at a higher rate, and then he had it increased to $136,975 a year, which he now gets. How was that done? Mr. Brady is the witness. It was done, he says, on the statement of Mr. Walsh himself that he had to employ so many more horses, so many more coaches, so many more men, because of the expedition and trips. Brady says he had no other evidence of it except Mr. Walsh's own statement, and he allowed him $136,975 a year for expedition and increase of trips on his own ex parte statement without any investigation. And who was Walsh? A banker in Washington now. The question is put to Mr. Brady:

Question. Did you have anything on which to predicate your action in allowing that $78,700 additional pay, except Mr. Walsh's own statement?

Answer. His sworn statement.

Q. Was that the only information that you had on which to predicate that action?

A. That and the fact that we had sought to have the service performed at a less rate before and failed in it. It is a difficult route.

Q. Then his sworn statement was what you relied upon?

A. That was what I principally relied upon, but I also relied upon the other fact that I could not get the service done at the former price by the former contractor, and that Mr. Walsh had peremptorily refused to do the service for anything like that sum of money.

Q. While you were in the Government employment in New Orleans, did you know Walsh there?

A. I did.

Q. Was he not indicted, on your own testimony, for frauds on the internal revenue?

A. I had him indicted for failing to produce his books as a distiller. He had been in the business for some years, and when I first went there I subpoenaed him, as I did all the other distillers in the city, to appear before me with their books; and those of them who failed to produce their books (which I had a right to call for under the internal-revenue law) I had indicted for fraud. That is the only indictment found against Mr. Walsh in connection with that matter.

Q. And that was on your own testimony?

A. I think so; on my testimony or on that of my agents who were with me.

Q. And yet on his own sworn statement alone you granted an increase of pay to the amount of $62,000 (in round numbers) in excess of the price allowed for the same service to his predecessor?

A. On his own statement, and for the reason (as I was saying) that I could not get the service performed for any less.

The testimony of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General shows that he gave Walsh the difference up to $136,975 a year on the Prescott and Santa Fé route for doing service that had been let to McDonough for $13,313 under whom Walsh was sub-contractor, who was the man who failed to perform the service, and now he requires the Government to pay $136,000 a year on that route for expedition and trips. I went yesterday to the Internal Revenue Department and I told General Baum that I desired to see what the indictments against Walsh were. He showed me the abstract. Walsh stands indicted now in New Orleans under two indictments for a conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States, as a distiller, in 1876, and Mr. Brady is marked as the witness who is to go down there and convict him of these offenses. I fear the Government will never get the testimony of Brady against him.

There are plenty more routes, increases, and arraignments of the same sort. I merely referred to this one as a specimen. I cannot go over them all. I do not propose to do it; but Mr. Kirk, one of the sureties of McDonough, was called, and Mr. Kirk testified that he never got a chance to take the service at anything exceeding $13,500 a year and of course he could not do it for that in the way McDonough was required to do it. But the best witness to illustrate these wrongs is Walsh himself. He is called as a witness, too, and what does he say?

Question. As it seems that your affidavit was all the basis the Department ever had upon which to predicate the increase to $136,000, why didn't you go on and make the sum $200,000? Didn't that seem just as easy as to make it $136,000?

Answer. The trouble with me all along has been that I have dealt on a per cent. all my life; if I had been in the mail service for some years I think the service on that route would have been at that figure. I think that you would be investigating me now with that route at $200,000.

Poor innocent man! He had not been in the service long enough to know how much to ask. It was just as easy to get out of General Brady $200,000 as $136,000; but he had not been dealing with the Post-Office Department long enough. These are the poor men whom the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] held up before the Senate as the helpless deserving men who were getting all the benefit of this star service! This poor fellow did not know what to ask, and therefore, fool-like, he contented himself with $136,000 instead of $200,000, which he could have got just as well as not, and that is a specimen of the much-lauded administration of this Department! That is why we are now making up deficiencies! That is obedience to law! And telling these things is what is called making false attacks on the Postmaster-General! I have nothing to do with General Brady; I have nothing to do with any clerk in the Post-Office Department; the Senate has nothing to do with him. The responsible head of that Department is the Postmaster-General, and all these things are presumed to come under his supervision; and if he keeps men there who do such things we have to look to him and his responsibility and not to them. I feel pretty sure that he was not very freely consulted when these things were going on. I think I can safely say that much for the Postmaster-General.

Take another route, from Vinita to Las Vegas. That was one referred to yesterday by the Senator from Texas—I am picking out now those that he called up. When that route was let from Vinita to Las Vegas through the Indian Territory and through the pan-handle of Texas, the statement is here showing that there is very little mail passing over the route; the service is done on a buckboard. There were twenty-one post-offices along that line in 1878; there are twenty-seven now. That route has been increased from $6,300 to $144,262, new service. A bond for $15,000 was given and has never been increased; it stands at that now, just the same as it was originally, and that is the rule, no matter how much the contract price is increased. Mr. BLOUNT asked the Second Assistant Postmaster-General about this:

Question. You say you have no knowledge at all as to the amount or the weight of the mails carried over these great lines where these large expenditures for service are made?

Answer. Oh, no; I did not say that; I said I had not had the mails weighed on those routes. I understand, however, that on the Vinita route they carry two or three sacks of mail a day.

One hundred and forty-four thousand dollars a year to take those two or three sacks!

Q. Two or three sacks?

A. Yes. That is rather indefinite, but that is the way the information comes to me from one of the agents out there.

Q. You have no knowledge, you say, at all of the revenue from those mails?

A. No, sir; not at this time. I presume that the revenues from the Las Vegas route are comparatively small. It runs through the Indian Territory, and its principal importance is in connecting the Indian agencies and the military posts through there and the few post-offices that are scattered through the pan-handle of Texas.

And yet, running through the Indian country, running through the pan-handle, connecting the military posts for the convenience of officers, perhaps, or something else, that route was increased from $6,330 to $144,260 a year, and there has only been an increase of six post-offices along the whole line.

Along the Prescott and Santa Fé route, of which I have just spoken, on which Walsh gets $136,000, and says he is sorry he did not make it $200,000—what is the condition there? There were fourteen post-offices two years ago and there are fourteen post-offices now. There has been no increase of post-offices. There are very few people living along on the lines of these routes.

On those three roads that I have referred to from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma, from Vinita to Las Vegas, from Prescott to Santa Fé the increase is $430,000, while the increase on ten thousand three hundred and odd routes in this country in all the States of the Union is only $300,000. Yet these the Senator from Texas says are the poor men of the West who were being crippled so terribly by our objections to the post-office star route system!

I have in my hand a short table showing that in the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, (which by the way has the lion's share, six hundred and thirty-eight,) Arkansas, Missouri, Tennessee, and Kentucky, there are 96,813 miles of star route and that all the pay that is given is $1,900,000, while in the far Western States, Nevada, California, Colorado, Oregon, Utah, Idaho, Montana, Dakota, Wyoming, the Indian Territory, New Mexico, and Arizona, where there are thirty-eight thousand miles of star route, the pay is $2,494,000. Thirty-eight thousand miles in these States and Territories receive half a million more money than 96,800 miles of star service in the twelve States that I have named. What does the table show? The Senator from Texas was speaking about these poor men getting no facilities. In those twelve States the average service per week is 2.32 trips, less than two and a half trips a week. In Kentucky it is 2.05. Not in any one of them except Texas does it exceed three, and in Texas it is 3.18, the average in all being 2.32. What is the average trip per week in the Territories? Three and sixty-one hundredths. There is more than half as much again to-day in these Territories as there is in the States.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. How much more do they get?

Mr. BECK. They get over half a million more. In ten of those States which we supply with star service there is a population of nearly fourteen millions, with seventy thousand miles of railroad, and they get a little over a million dollars, while those Western States and Territories, with less than one-tenth of the population, are getting two and a half millions. But I must hurry on.

The mode of increasing the service is simply iniquitous. I deny the construction given to the law as requiring the increased pay that is invariably allowed by the Postmaster-General and maintained by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Section 3960 is the section referred to. That section provides:

SEC. 3960. Compensation for additional service in carrying the mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service; and when any such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order, and entered upon the books of the Department; and no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order.

The Postmaster-General and the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads declare that that law requires the Postmaster-General to give double the pay whenever he gets double the service. It does no such thing.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that the Senator from Texas made no such statement, and he will not find it at all in the RECORD.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. MAXEY. Look at the RECORD and see the particular route I was talking about. I was discussing the route from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma. The law says it must be in exact proportion. The exact proportion was $321,000; the contract is $299,000.

Mr. BECK. That is for expedition. There was no increase of service there.

Mr. MAXEY. The principle is exactly the same in the two sections. What is true for one is true for the other.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. I will show that presently. Then the Postmaster-General and his Second Assistant Postmaster-General appeared before the committees of the House and Senate, and each of them asserted the fact to be that such was the law, and that that was their construction of it. The Senator from Texas yesterday said that the Postmaster-General was obeying the law, and if it was a bad law we should change it. There is not an instance where the Post-Office Department has ever doubled the trips that they have not doubled the pay, or trebled it if they trebled the service, and when they made it from daily to weekly they uniformly made it seven times as great, when the statute only provides that that is the maximum that they shall never exceed; but it is their duty as public officers to do what the good of the service requires, and to get it done as cheaply as they can.

What is their plan? Just as they did in the case of Fort Worth and Fort Yuma when they came to let out to their favorites; they decrease the speed, they cut off the number of trips. Some man that they want to have the route gets it, and takes it for little or nothing. Then in less than a month, sometimes in less than a week, always very soon, more trips are added and the pay is doubled. Expedition is ordered, and then what happens? No testimony is taken; none is required except that of the man who has got the contract, and who got it for little or nothing, in order that he might have increased trips and increased speed, and there is where the profit lies. Just as the Senator from Texas very properly said in his letter, it was an increase of compensation to contractors; that was urged as a leading reason for expedition, that they ought not to be crippled by working at low rates. Take this case for example: A new route is opened in the West. There is no road; there are no bridges, no ferry, no station-house, no wells—nothing. It is fifty miles long; it is ordered at five miles an hour to go through in ten hours, and $5,000 a year is given for the service three times a week. The service is doubled to six times a week, with the same schedule of time, five miles an hour and fifty miles in ten hours, and $10,000 is paid, just double. Nevertheless, recollect that when the contractor took that route first at $5,000 for fifty miles, he had his bridges to build, he had his ferries to establish, if any, he had his station-houses to build, he had his stables to build for his horses, he had his wells to dig; he had everything to do, and he took it. I am assuming that he was dealing fairly with himself and the Government, to receive $5,000 a year for four years; at this rate he could make money on the route. It is doubled. Is the cost doubled to him? All the roads are established and built, all the stations are built, all the stables are built, and the wells are dug.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky if although all the stables and stations are built and the wells are dug, when you change the schedule and make the service at five miles an hour where it was only a mile and a half before, do you not necessarily have to double up your stations and increase the number of wells and so on?

Mr. BECK. You do not necessarily have to double them. When you put on expedition you have to add some more. I will come to that directly. I am on the first section now, 3690, in regard to trips. When you merely increase trips do you have to build any more stables? Do you have to sink any more wells? Do you have to employ any more hostlers? You may have to work them a little harder. Do you have to do anything amounting to 25 per cent. or 50 per cent. at the outside of the original cost? That amount of increased pay would be ample compensation to a man who has merely doubled his trips, with no roads to build, no stations to build, the bridges all in order, his same hostlers, his same blacksmiths, his same everything on hand.

There never was a case in which a hundred per cent. is not allowed, though there are abundant instances where 25 per cent. increase would have been ample, and the Post-Office officials know it well. There is not a case in all the thousands where the pay is less than doubled, and there is where the profit to the contractor is.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky, because the argument he is endeavoring to make is in reply to the legal argument, whether in any single instance in all the investigation made by the Senate Committee on Appropriations and the committee of the House one case has been brought up where the Postmaster-General went beyond what that identical section 3960 authorized him to go when there was an increase of service? Then the question is whether his judgment or discretion was good or not. The question is, did he violate the law as the law-makers made it?

Mr. BECK. I argued yesterday and showed that he had wantonly violated the law in exceeding his appropriations and in making contracts beyond his appropriations, and it was for that that I sought to hold him responsible. The Senator from Texas never replied to that, except to indorse him by contending that he could spend all we gave him in six months or three months if he liked. He turned over to these other sections that I am now reading and speaking about and showed that the Postmaster-General thought they were bad and ought to be modified. These sections apply to the administration of the Department and only to the administration of the Department. I know of no instance where he went beyond the maximum fixed by the law; I am not claiming that he did, but I know that there is no instance where under the discretion given him, and under the duty imposed upon him, he ever sought to save the money of the people of the United States by coming one dollar under the maximum for increase of trips. He pretends to construe that law to mean that he is obliged to give them double. The Senator undertakes to say that he ought to give them double, when 25 per cent. or 50 per cent. would often be a fair compensation, and I deny that that is a just administration of the Government.

Mr. MAXEY. Then the Senator from Kentucky and myself differ. He charges directly in the preamble that the Post-Office Department had disregarded the law, and now he admits they have not disregarded the law.

Mr. BECK. Either the Senator from Texas or myself have very confused ideas of this argument, for we surely differ very widely. I will again state what I charge the Postmaster-General with doing in plain violation of law. Section 3679 provides that—

No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

That is regardless of trips, regardless of expedition, regardless of anything. All his discretion must be exercised inside of and in obedience to the law. The preamble to the bill recites that—

Whereas there is a deficiency in the appropriations made by Congress for the star postal service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, caused by the Post-Office Department disregarding the law which prohibits the expenditure of money in excess of appropriations, or the making of contracts which involve the Government for the payment of money in excess of appropriations, which deficiency, unless supplied, threatens to deprive the people of the necessary mail services to which they are entitled: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc.

I was not referring in the argument I made yesterday, nor in the preamble either, to section 3960 or section 3961, which alone refer to routes, increase of trips, and expedition, and have nothing to do with the law regulating expenditures on making contracts in excess thereof. If I did not make that plain I do not know how to make it plainer.

Mr. MAXEY. As the Senator has been making a reply to my argument, I ask him if the very section which he has read, and which he says has been violated, does not give the Post-Office Department a discretion by its very terms to expend the money appropriated within the fiscal year, and if the only limit in regard to it is that the Postmaster-General shall not within the fiscal year expend more money than is appropriated? How much he shall spend in one month, how much he shall spend in one day, or in one quarter, or in two quarters is not limited by that law, but is within his discretion. I will say to the Senator that the principle for which I am contending is that where discretion is given by law to any public officer, a judge, or what not, and he remains within the law, no court can damage him for a misexercise of that discretion within the law, nor could Congress do it, nor can Congress say that the Postmaster-General violated the law when he has not expended more than the whole of the $5,900,000 for the current fiscal year, when the current fiscal year is not ended, and will not be ended until the 30th of June, 1880. Hence he has not violated the law as charged in that preamble.

Mr. BECK. This is the argument as I understand it: I ask the Senator from Texas how much he will board my son for for one year, who is going to school in his town. He says he will board him for $500. I give it to him; it is all he asks. He comes and says to me on the 1st day of February, "I shall stop feeding your son and turn him out of doors unless you give me more money. I had discretion to do as I liked. I undertook to board him for the whole year for $500, but I spent all the money in seven months; he may starve the rest of the time." Would that be a compliance with the contract?

Mr. MAXEY. I do not think that that is a fair statement.

Mr. BECK. The Postmaster-General told us that for a given sum of money all the star routes of the country could be maintained for twelve months. We gave it to him, and he diverted it to other purposes, and on the 20th day of February he said, "I will stop all your mail service unless you give me $2,000,000 more." And now the Senator says that because he has not yet spent it all, although it will all be gone in a few days, gone by reason of his violation of the law, as he has to pay the men he has employed $600,000 and take that out of the sum we gave, to save himself from impeachment, that that is a compliance with the Postmaster-General's obligations. Is not that the argument?

Mr. MAXEY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I want him to be fair and just.

Mr. BECK. I am trying to give a fair answer.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Kentucky knows just as well as I do that the Postmaster-General in reply to him stated that he did not believe the amount of his estimates was sufficient to carry on the postal service for the current fiscal year, but that it was cut down in Cabinet meeting against his will, and especially by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. In his replies (in which I give him credit for being exceedingly temperate, calm, and dignified under the circumstances) he furthermore said that after the estimates were sent in two thousand additional routes had been added by Congress and he had placed four hundred and thirty-four thousand dollars' worth of service out of the $5,900,000 on those new routes, which were not estimated for because they were made after he had sent in his estimates to Congress. Fair dealing with a man requires that this statement should go upon the record.

Mr. BECK. The Postmaster-General estimated not only for the existing routes but for what he thought would be a proper increase. He was under no sort of obligation to place service upon those new routes unless he thought the good of the service required it. While the suggestion was made that that was the cause of the great expenditure when he was demanding $2,000,000 and admitting that he had put service on in excess of the appropriations $1,720,004, only the pitiful sum of $434,000 was expended in all the two thousand new routes which he said Congress had thrown upon him about which there was so much parade. Upon one of these new routes, from Vinita to Las Vegas, through the Indian Territory, where there are only a few military posts, with hardly anybody to receive or send mail-matter, he paid $144,262, when there were two thousand new routes ordered by Congress. Nearly half of what he paid was on one little route in the Indian Territory that he let for $6,000 and increased up to over $140,000. Is that good, honest, or economical administration?

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky, in that connection, if he does not know that the Postmaster-General made it known to him that the General of the Army recommended the route from Vinita to Las Vegas as one of the most economical measures that could be adopted, because it aided in the solution of the Indian troubles, and would do more than all the laws of Congress, and as a measure of wise economy it ought to be adopted. In the exercise of that discretion which the law gave him he stated that he took into account this statement of General Sherman, as well as the statement of General Davidson, who commanded the troops there at Fort Elliot in the pan-handle.

Mr. BECK. The General of the Army of course wanted easier riding; the General of the Army recommended it, and the military men at the posts would want it, and the Senator from Texas recommended everything, too, of course. What of that?

Mr. MAXEY. I cannot answer that kind of an argument.

Mr. BECK. It is popular to recommend those things, and it is right to recommend them, but that forms no excuse for the Postmaster-General to take $144,000 to put on a route of that sort and curtail 10,300 routes in order to do it. Here is the General's letter, I think.

Mr. MAXEY. I have got it here, if the Senator has not got it.

Mr. BECK. There are only two or three sacks of mail carried over it, and the General of the Army recommended it; but you will see that the General of the Army (if there is to be any more authority in what he says than to what a private citizen says) fears it will cost too much to do it. Still he recommended it. He said:

I am sure a daily mail carried in coaches from Vinita, Indian Territory, via Fort Reno, Camp Supply, Fort Elliott, Bascomb, Union, &c., will contribute largely to the settlement of that region, and would be most valuable, but I fear the cost would hardly be justified for a few years yet. Still I approve the above.

That is the strong recommendation of the General of the Army, and he fears that the cost will hardly be justified for a few years yet.

Mr. MAXEY. Another statement that the General of the Army made—and it might just as well have been read in the same letter—is as follows:

The establishment of these transcontinental roads, such as the Yellowstone, Platte, Arkansas, and El Paso, has done more to settle the everlasting Indian question than all the laws of Congress.

You will find in a letter which I wrote in regard to the lines down on the Rio Grande I stated:

I am impressed with the belief, and shall, when I can secure time, make it appear in a communication to you on that point, that increased mail facilities around the entire Rio Grande front would be a splendid cordon of pickets in many ways and do much toward establishing peace on the border, and thus a measure of wise economy.

All these things in the very nature of the case must be taken into consideration by the Postmaster-General in the exercise of a wise discretion such as the law gives him.

Mr. BECK. It all comes back to the same proposition that there is no discretion given to the Postmaster-General to exceed the appropriations made by law for the business of the fiscal year. On the contrary, the prohibition is positive that he shall not exceed them. There is no discretion given him to make contracts to involve the Government for the payment of more than the amount appropriated; and the law says he shall not do it. Yet the Postmaster-General admits he has exceeded the appropriation to the extent of a million and a half; and he has expended it all so as to make it necessary to cut down the star routes to weekly service on the 1st of March; and the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads thinks he has the right under the law in the exercise of his discretion to do it, although it will cost over $600,000 in money and the loss of four months' mail service to keep him technically within the law. I say there is not a man in the country who will not say that the very statement of the proposition answers the argument. It is absurd to assume that Congress ever intended any such thing or that any just man would assume that any such power was given to him. As well might the War Department use all the appropriation made for the Army in six months and let it starve for the rest of the year, as well let the Navy go at the end of six months, as well might any other of the great Departments of the Government come and demand more money or say that the service shall be discontinued, as for the Postmaster-General to come and make these demands now.

The sections I am arguing to-day are sections relating to administration. I am trying to show that this Department is badly administered and that the money that was spent was not spent in any proper way, although it may not have been a direct violation of the law to do it if appropriations had been made sufficient for the purpose. The Postmaster-General had the authority to pay double for double service, that I admit; I do not know how many routes he doubled. I have shown that in every instance where he doubled the mail service he doubled the compensation. I want to know from the Senator from Texas whether or not the frontier of Texas is protected any more by the route from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma going at the rate of four miles an hour than it was when it was going at three miles an hour, for before the $164,000 or $165,000 was given a mail was going along that route every day. There was a few hours' difference perhaps at near points and a day or two at the utmost, but one mail every day was going over that route at $134,000, and while we know that mails and roads and everything else open countries up, why should expedition be put on to double and quadruple what was paid originally be added because of speed when the people are getting no increase of mail, only receiving the mail every day as they did before?

I have in my hand a list of twenty routes, showing the original cost of the trips as let, the cost of the extra trips, none of them running up to daily trips, the cost of the expedition, the present total cost, the cost if the trips had been made daily and doubled every time. The present cost now paid because of expedition, where they are getting only four and five, and only in one or two cases six trips a day, we are paying for that expedition $397,784 more money than it would cost to give the people on every one of those routes daily trips even though every time they doubled the service they doubled the cost of the original service.

Statement showing a few instances of many where routes have been increased from one and two to three trips per week, then expedited. If they had been increased to seven trips (daily) at pro rata pay per trip, leaving schedule time untouched, expedition would have been unnecessary, for there would have been a delivery every twenty-four hours instead of forty-eight and, from Friday until Monday, of seventy-two hours, as frequency would have taken the place of expedition.

That statement shows that it is not to give the people mail facilities that these allowances for expedition are made; it is to enable the great contractors to run their stages and break down the express companies, competing with them and making their money otherwise. The Postmaster-General says, and so does his Second Assistant and so do all the contractors, "Cut down the number of trips if you please, but do not cut down the speed; it is the speed that has enabled us to build up a lucrative business." They care nothing about the mails for the people. We say, "Give them daily mails." No, the contractors do not want that; therefore the Department does not want it, and they protest against the cutting down of the expedition which enables them to give pay as they like in proportion to the number of horses, mules, or men that the contractor swears he will have to put on because of the increased speed, and without any information except his own say-so as to the proportion which the increase of mules, horses, and men bore to the original cost in that which is given him; and he gets it for four years. How is it done? The moment a man gets a route in his possession it is his for good. Mr. Salesbury understands that well. He is a very good contractor so far as I know—the largest in the United States—and he gives very good bonds. He gives Messrs. Haggin & Fevis, of San Francisco, on his bond. The Senators from California no doubt know who they are. Mr. Salesbury was questioned by myself:

Question. After you once obtain possession of a route by having it awarded to you, can there be any competition by anybody else in regard to increase of service or expedition?

Answer. Provided I cannot perform the services required by the Government.

Q. But if you can, no one can compete with you?

A. No, sir; not during the term of four years.

Q. Therefore, your avowal of competency at any price prevents the Department from giving it to anybody else, so far as expedition is concerned?

A. I think it does so far as any one else is concerned, but they can refuse it to me if they see fit.

Q. They can; but they are obliged to give it to you in order to expedite the business if you avow a willingness to perform it?

A. That is my understanding.

Mr. MAXEY. Is that the fault of the Postmaster-General or the fault of the law?

Mr. BECK. That is the fault of the law?

Mr. MAXEY. That is what I supposed.

Mr. BECK. And that is the only law that I know of that the Postmaster-General is seeking to amend. When the Senator from Texas was arguing yesterday that the Postmaster-General was seeking to amend the law that was the law to which he referred. The law under which I was arraigning the Postmaster-General was the law under which he was spending money in excess of the appropriations and making contracts in violation of law, and not with regard to this law at all.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to suggest that on I think page 14 of the report of the Postmaster-General for the year 1879, the one sent to us at the present session, he will find at the same right-hand page that the Postmaster-General recommends the amendment of both section 3960 and section 3961.

Mr. BECK. I am trying to show the bad management heretofore under them both. The Senator from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, will not do his duty as well as he generally does it if he does not promptly report a bill to correct those laws, and I do not see why it was not done long ago.

Mr. MAXEY. I stated to the Senate yesterday what, I presume, the Senator from Kentucky did not hear, that on the 2d day of June, 1879, a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives and that a substitute was reported on the 16th day of December, 1879, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads by the chairman, [Mr. MONEY,] and the bill is there pending, but has never been touched by that House, so far as the RECORD shows; so that there is no need for the Post-Office Committee here introducing a bill when a corresponding bill in the House is pending there.

Mr. BECK. Why does not the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate, who know so well about these bad laws and know all the evils, and who are in constant communication with the Postmaster-General, introduce and bring before the Senate a bill which will at least remedy some of the flagrant evils which they themselves confess exist in the management of these affairs?

Mr. MAXEY. Because a like bill is now pending in the other House.

Mr. BECK. I hope my argument will do something to stir up the Senator from Texas and show him the abuses that are now practiced. With increases from $6,000 to $146,000, increases from $134,000 in his own State to $299,000, when a railroad has advanced three hundred miles in the mean time that is not being used and Mr. Huntington is dividing the great profits now given by the Post-Office with that route, and from Prescott to Santa Fé, where Mr. Walsh comes in and swears that he is getting $136,000, and is only sorry that he did not ask $200,000, and if he had been a little smarter he would have had that instead of the other, why does not the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads remedy those things? If I have helped to make them do that I have accomplished a good work.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to state to the Senator from Kentucky that the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is about as attentive to his business, or thinks he is, as the Senator from Kentucky, and he needs no prodding to do his duty. I do not ask any aid in that regard. The chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads stated here, and has repeated over and over again, the fact that a bill was regularly reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House, and is now pending in the House, having been favorably reported, to accomplish these objects. Therefore, according to my view of business, there is no need of repeating that operation here.

Mr. BECK. I know how attentive the Senator from Texas is, and I know how sensitive he is, particularly upon subjects of that sort; but I remind him, as I have been doing all day, that the Post-Office Department, which he says is run in the interest of poor men having as much right to the benefits of the service as the banker in North Middletown has, gives to his State and the western Territories for thirty-eight thousand miles of road two million and a half dollars, while in my State and in ten others, with seventy thousand miles of exactly such routes, we are getting less than $2,000,000. These new States and Territories are now getting a much larger percentage of the star service than the State of Kentucky or any of these older States. The Territories, the Indian Territory and all, according to the tables, are getting largely in excess of what we are getting, and now our mails are to be stopped because the Postmaster-General has seen fit to order it, and we are to have nothing, and that is said to be right and in accordance with law!

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to remind the Senator of one thing. Let us have fair play.

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator makes a comparison of the number of miles, and would have one suppose and have the country believe that the star service east of the Mississippi river is corresponding in troubles and difficulties with the star service west of that river. I say to the Senator that there are but six routes east of the Mississippi river one hundred miles long. One of them is a canal route over here in Virginia. While you have your ten thousand routes that you are talking about, some of them one mile long, some two miles long, others three miles long, the general average being twenty miles long, where your man has got nothing to do but to hire a boy and a mule, with your taverns already fixed, with corn in the country, and everything in plenty—to compare that with a route fifteen hundred and sixty miles long, a large portion of which is through a wilderness, where you have got to dig your wells, make your station-houses, make your stables, haul your provisions and corn one hundred miles, is to my mind an absolute absurdity. The comparison will not do.

Mr. BECK. I know how absurd the Senator from Texas can imagine things are, but I think it will strike the country as being still more absurd that after a contract had been made along the very route of which he spoke, and bond and security given to comply with it at $134,000 a year, when the service was being performed and a mail was being furnished every day to the people, merely to make it go a little bit faster in the interest of contractors and give them a little more pay, that much money has to be withdrawn from other routes that really need it, even the three miles or five miles or any other mile routes in the Eastern States, and they are to be told it is more important when a contractor had contracted to carry the mails for $134,000 a year to give him $164,000, furnishing the people no more mail, that the Postmaster-General is right, and it is good management that he could cut down all the mails east of the Mississippi River from a daily and weekly service in order that that could be done.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I will say that that very route was appropriated for by Congress.

Mr. BECK. I said before and I will say again that the Fort Worth and Yuma route was established a year ago. I admit it was run faster a year ago than it was at the last letting.

Mr. COKE. But the appropriation was made at the last session of Congress for it.

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. No money was therefore taken from any other route to run it.

Mr. BECK. I am not finding fault with that route any more than I am with any other route.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky if he thinks it is not a matter of the slightest importance whether the mail runs fast or slow, if he thinks that is a matter of no consequence to the people out West? They are poor, that is true. How would you like the mail running between New York and San Francisco, costing about $1,800,000, to be put on a freight train so that it would not cost more than $200,000? One is a seven-days schedule; the other is twenty-five days. If your principle is good, apply it to the great line from New York to San Francisco, and you would have a howl that you would remember.

Mr. BECK. Here is another table. The original schedule of time on twelve routes is given and the increase per mile of the expedited schedule is given, swelling it up from about one-third, or 33.13, to 50.16. The difference in miles per hour is given, varying from one to one and a half and in one instance two; and the difference in cost of these twelve routes because of that expedition alone, without delivering a single mail more than before, is $735,182.20. I said yesterday about $750,000 out of the $930,000 of this increase. This is the table, here are the routes, and all the country gains is the speed a little bit faster, and along all these lines of road the average speed is much greater than it is in many of the older States even along their good roads.

Statement of miles per hour of original schedule, expedited schedule, difference, and cost of difference.

Average miles per hour, 2.76, 4.22, 1.46. Or an increase of speed from 23 miles to 41 costs $735,182.20 on twelve routes alone, and the fastest line of all, No. 46120, Soledad to Newhall, California, gets the least pay.

But I have spoken much longer than I intended. While I believe that the House had very good reason for finding fault with the administration, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate did not intend to cut down any of the service now or to try to find who was guilty or who was not guilty. I concede to the contractor a right to get all he can; but our officers ought to get the service done as cheaply for us as they can. They have not done it; they have not tried to do it. The proof shows that they have been reckless and careless in their expenditures, grossly extravagant; and while I do not believe that the head of the Department himself has been guilty of it, he is responsible for all that is done under him, and he is the only person to whom Congress can speak. The others are his subordinates nominally.

Therefore while we first agreed with the House to give $970,000—and I believe that is enough, and I think I can show it—for fear that somebody might say we were pinching the mail service, by the amendment now pending we have agreed to make it $1,100,000, which we all know is ample. And why do we say so? According to the statement of Mr. Lilley, the Assistant Sixth Auditor, the amount necessary for all the contracts is $1,155,000. For the current six months there are no deductions for fines and penalties off that. For the first six months of the year there were $101,000 of fines and penalties imposed. If half that amount is imposed for the current six months, then it brings it down to exactly the sum that we have given, and there will in all probability be quite as much for the current six months as there was for the last, and then they have other sources besides of making money and saving money. Let me read a case furnished to me by the chairman of the sub-committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and taken from the order books of the Department to see what their administration is:

No. 2038, January 22, 1880.

Number of route, 40104.

Termini of route—Mineral Park, Arizona Territory; Pioche, Nevada.

Length of route, two hundred and thirty-two miles; number of trips per week, seven; contractor, J. W. Dorsey; pay, $52,033.33 per annum; sub-contractor, M. C. Perrell; pay, $52,033.33.

The mail bills received by inspection division showing little mail-matter passing over this route, as per files of said division, and that the service is most irregularly and inefficiently performed:

Ordered, That service on said route be reduced from the 1st day of February next to what it was at original letting, both as to trips and speed, without one month's extra pay.

From February 1, 1880, reduce service from seven trips per week to one trip per week and increase running time from sixty to eighty-four hours; decrease contractor's pay $49,051.33 per annum, being amount allowed by orders bearing date December 31, 1878, (number 11446), and July 23, 1879, (number 6334), for increase of trips and expedition of running time, without one month's extra pay on service dispensed with. The present pay is $2,982.

There is a clear case of confession that they gave a contractor $52,033.33 on a route originally let for about $2,900; and now the good of the service requires as shown by their own order-book that $49,051.33 be stricken from that $52,033.33, and the service go on from Mineral Park to Pioche at the $2,900 originally given. There is $49,000 more that they have and can apply to the service that is needed; and they can do the same on a great many other routes.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is just what they propose to do with all the routes over the country east of the Mississippi River.

Mr. BECK. Just about; and pay $600,000 for the privilege of doing so!

Mr. BOOTH. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. BOOTH. I understood him to say a few minutes ago that the Department had recklessly and without reason increased the cost of this star service. I should like to ask the Senator for information how the cost per mile for the present year compares with the cost per mile for previous years for the same service?

Mr. BECK. I understand that it is about the same. That was the testimony of the Postmaster-General, if I recollect aright. The Senator from California was on the sub-committee with me, and I think he will remember that the Postmaster-General said about the same. I can turn to it in a moment.

Mr. BOOTH. I thought, perhaps, the Senator had the testimony directly before him.

Mr. BECK. The exact amount is nine and a quarter, about.

Mr. BOOTH. My impression is it is lower this year than any other time with the exception of one year.

Mr. BECK. The Senator will recollect that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Brady, further stated that he was now getting the service much lower. The bids were much lower for the service this year than ever before. This question was asked him:

Question. Generally, on those long routes out there, did the last year's lettings rule above or below the figures of the preceding year?

Answer. They were generally much lower. We saved in that section at that letting some $1,200,000, I think.

They were let that much lower; and I desire to say that it is perfectly obvious that if laws could be passed prohibiting the payment for increase of trips beyond 25 or 50 per cent., and for increase of expedition cut it off altogether, and make the original letting at a reasonable rate of speed, say three or four or five miles an hour, which is the fastest they ever go, millions could be saved, instead of giving the routes for almost nothing to pet contractors and then building them up by increase of trips and expeditions, as was done in the three routes to which I have referred from $6,000 to $150,000, from $13,000 to $135,000, and from $134,000 up to $299,000, which is absolutely squandering the money of the people.

I will not trouble the Senate longer.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into any very extensive and general discussion of the questions which have been discussed by the Senator from Kentucky. I find that the bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations contains a preamble which recites that the Post-Office Department, disregarding and in violation of the law, has made certain expenditures. "Disregarding the law" is the term used. The Senator from Kentucky has to a considerable extent based his argument on a violation of the statute, and he has arraigned the Department for a failure to obey and observe the provisions of the statute that requires the Department to keep within the appropriations. He admits, however, that there is a discretion vested in the Postmaster-General with reference to expediting service and with reference to the increase of service. So it seems to me that the quarrel that the Senator from Kentucky has with the Department is that he doubts the proper exercise of discretion on the part of the Department, while the statute confers this power upon the Department. While the statute says the Department shall have a discretionary power, the Senator says it has not wisely and properly exercised that power.

I submit to the Senator from Kentucky and to every other Senator that when a discretionary power is lodged or vested in an officer, he alone is the judge when it is proper to exercise that power; and it is utterly impossible for that power to be properly and safely lodged in any officer if the Senate, the House, or anybody else is to come in and overhauit it. If we can come in here and say to the Postmaster-General, "it is true the statute said you might judge of the emergency that required expedited service or increased trips, yet we do not think it was proper to increase the trips on this route to six times a week, we think five would have been ample; we do not think it was proper to expedite this route to fifteen days when twenty-five would have been all that was necessary." What is the use of the law vesting this discretion in the Post-Office Department? There can be no violation of the law if the law has thus vested in this officer a discretionary power.

But the Senator says the statutes provide in another section that no Department shall exceed the appropriations. These appropriations are made with a view to the service that is proposed at the time; they are made for the railroad service in existence, made for the steamboat service in existence, and made for the star-route service in existence at the time, and then an estimate is made of the number of new routes necessary to be established and their cost. There never is any estimate and never has been any estimate made that I have been able to find for expedited service, nor any estimate made of the cost of increased trips. That is a matter which is intrusted to the discretion of the Department. Besides, you must take the statutes together, the statute that says the Department shall not exceed the appropriations, and the statute that says the Department may judge of the emergency of the case and expedite or increase the service.

The Senator from Kentucky says the head of this Department is personally a very honest man, but officially he argues that he must be very dishonest. I suppose by that he means to say that he has not stolen any of the public funds; by that he means to say that the head of this Department has not had any hand or finger in this increase, and does not make any money out of the operation. Sir, the Senator need not have said that. With all the clamor that has been made over this star service nobody has yet been found to charge the head of this Department with any impropriety except, perhaps, as it is charged, an abuse of discretion. It is said that he has exceeded what good judgment would have required. It is said that he has been guilty of an error of judgment. That is what we have to expect whenever we intrust to a public officer the exercise of discretionary power. But it is not true that he has misused the discretionary power vested in him by the statutes. It is not true that the head of this Department has exceeded the authority given him by the statutes.

The star service is the great service of the country. It is the expensive service in one sense of the term. It has long routes through forests, over mountains, and through deserts; but it does not cost the money that the railroad service and the steamboat service cost. A fair analysis of the appropriations will show that the railroad and steamboat routes cost the Government of the United States but a trifle less than $13,000,000 every year, and in that we do not include the advantage that the people have who live along those lines of free delivery in the cities that add very largely to the expenses of the postal Department. Leaving that out, it costs twice as much to run the steamboat and railroad routes as it does the star service in the West.

Mr. President, everybody should take into consideration in determining this question of expense the vast magnitude of the territory over which the star-route service extends. If you exclude Alaska and if you exclude Washington Territory, which is not affected by this bill as it came from the House, because none of the routes in Washington had been expedited or increased, more than one-half of the entire area of the United States lies within the territory included in the one hundred and seven routes which are affected by the bill. If you include Washington Territory, that is directly affected if this bill is so framed as to strike down the great routes, then 225,000 square miles of territory, more than one-half of the whole area of the country, are interested in this bill.

It has been my fortune for a good many years to live where the mail service was the star-route service. I have seen a good deal of this star-route service, and I know what every man ought to know who has given attention to the history of the country, whether he lived in the West or whether he lived in the East, that these star-route services are the great engines that open up the western country to civilization. We first open with a slow mail, and we supply a few hardy pioneers who put themselves on the line of that route. In a little while come heavier settlements, more people, and they demand, as they have a right to demand—for I believe, as the Senator from Texas said, that the mail service is the poor man's service as well as the rich man's—increased facilities, increased opportunities of conversation, so to speak, with their friends whom they have left in the East. The mail service to the people in the West is a more important thing than it is to the people in the East. The people who live on the lines of railroads running east and west and north and south, and who have every hour of the day, almost, a train passing through their town carrying the United States mail, and who, as has already been said in this debate, have five or six times a day their letters laid upon their tables, have very little idea of the consequences to the people in the West of the curtailing and restricting of this service. It is not a simple question of letters, it is a question of books; it is a question of newspapers. More than half of the libraries in the West to-day have gone through the mail; more than half of all the reading matter of the people in an area bigger than all the country east of the Mississippi River comes through the mail. Not only that, but since the laws have enabled them to send merchandise in the mail a large part and portion of the little comforts and luxuries that they use in their families, in the way of small dry goods and millinery and that class of goods, come through the mails.

I have heard it said in this debate, and I have had my attention called to it, that some gentlemen in the East, living in the great city of New York and other big cities, have claimed that they support the mail service. That is not the fact. The great city of New York, which furnishes more net money to the mails than any other place, does not furnish over and above its population any greater proportion of the postal revenue than the people in Nevada, Colorado, or California. They send out immense quantities from their stores and from their publishing-houses by the mail, upon which we pay the postal duties and not they, and they get the credit because the matter starts at that office. In the city of New York, in the city of Philadelphia, in the city of Chicago are vast establishments that are in the dry-goods trade which are practically supported to-day by the people who buy through the mails; and every mail that goes to Idaho and that goes to Montana and that goes to the far West, beyond the railroad lines especially, is freighted with this material that pays to the Government sixteen cents a pound, and that it costs the Government less than that to transport it from the city of New York.

One of the witnesses before the Senate Committee on Appropriations testified in reference to the mail going into the Deadwood country. He said that the expense to the Government was about five cents a pound, while the express charge was much greater—twice or three times that, if I recollect—and that induced people to buy every little article they could buy in this way and send it by mail, and that includes everything that does not weigh more than four pounds; and women and men, too, will send to the great cities and buy fifteen or twenty pounds of material and have it done up in packages of four pounds each and pay their sixteen cents a pound for it and have it shipped over these lines. Said one of these men when before the committee, "When I commenced running on this line I had one hundred pounds of mail-matter a week; now my mail-matter is from ten hundred to twenty hundred pounds a day."

Who gets the advantage of this? The Government of the United States in part, and the people in part. The Government gets well paid for the transportation, and the people in the far West have the advantage of a direct and easy communication with the people of the East at reasonable rates.

It cannot be claimed that this service ought to be supported by the people affected. There are very few States in the Union that furnish sufficient to support their postal service. The extreme West does its proportion. There are ten States in the Union that furnish less to the postal revenues than the State I in part represent. It is not the extreme West, then, that is depleting the public Treasury by calling for appropriations in this direction.

But if it was true that the extreme West was making the deficiency in this branch of the public service, is there any reason why these people should not have mail facilities? Is there any reason why the Government should not support the postal service as it supports the Army? Is there any reason why it should not support this service as it supports the Navy? It comes nearer to the people; it affects their health, their intelligence, in a greater proportion than any other service, and this is the service of all others that ought to be paid for out of the public Treasury and out of the public collections.

The service is neither unreasonable in the West nor very expensive. There has been a demand made upon the Post-Office Department during the last year for expedited service and increased trips, and in the State that I in part represent there are seven routes, long trunk routes, affected by this bill as it came from the House. Upon every one of the applications for expediting and increasing the service on these routes I think it will be found that my name is entered as approving, indorsing, and urging the Department to do what has been done. I went day after day at the demand of my constituents, believing I was discharging a duty that I owed to them and to the country, and urged this expedited service and these increases of trips; and I propose, so far as I am concerned, to take the full responsibility of it, and I believe it has been done not in violation of law, but in perfect accordance with the law, and demanded by the necessities and the wants of the people.

There has been an emigration to the West within the last two years, within the last year indeed, unusual. A witness before this committee the other day said that the emigration into the mining regions of the West has been more in the last year and a half than in the preceding ten years altogether. Is no provision to be made for those people? Who are they, and from whence have they come? They are from New England and from New York and from the South, from all portions of the country who go out there to make a home and to build up States, and they have lost none of their rights because they have been, unfortunately perhaps, compelled to leave the endearments of home and the luxuries of the East and go out in the West to rough it. They ought to have the fostering hand and care of this Government, and they ought to have mail facilities equal to those they had in the States they left. No portion of the West to-day can compare with the State of Kentucky and many of the older sections of the country in facilities for receiving and sending out mails.

It is said that some expense attended this. Undoubtedly; and yet it can be shown that this Department has not increased the expenses except as it was necessary to increase the service, and I have here a table, which has been prepared and handed me, that I believe to be correct, and which I am willing to indorse, of long lines of routes under this present administration in the western country, which shows conclusively that this administration has been an economical one. I want to say a word here about this administration. Since I have had any knowledge of public affairs, since I have been in the western country and seen these operations of the public mail service, I say that there has been no administration that so thoroughly understood the wants of the people in this particular as the present postal management with Mr. Key at its head. He has given us a service infinitely better than was ever given to the people west of the Mississippi River at any time since my attention has been called to it, and that is for nearly twenty years, and it has been done cheaper and has been done better, and reflects the highest credit upon him, both with reference to the economy and with reference to the zeal that he has manifested in furnishing these people with mail facilities.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some of these routes and the old prices, not by way of disparagement, not by way of finding fault with former prices, but to show that the charge of extravagance and inattention to the interest of the Government in this particular is not well founded. Take the route from Kelton, in Utah, to The Dalles, in Oregon, a distance of six hundred and ninety-five miles. From August 1, 1870, up to June 30, 1874, the annual expense of that mail was $224,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What is it now, I ask the Senator?

Mr. TELLER. I will tell the honorable Senator. It would not be any very great object for me to give the one, without giving the other. I want to make a comparison, and show that the mail is now carried much cheaper than formerly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It would be well for the Senator to take some of the routes talked of here, instead of some others that have not been talked of at all.

Mr. TELLER. I am making this speech myself. When the honorable Senator comes to reply, as I understand he proposes to do in defense of this preamble and bill as it originally came here, he can present his own side of the case. He will probably make a great deal better speech; but it will be his and not mine.

Two hundred and twenty-four thousand dollars was the price for service on that route up to 1874. From March 1, 1875, to June 30, 1878, it was $134,700. Under the present Postmaster-General, from 1878 to 1882, the rate is $84,500.

Take then the route from Boise City to Winnemucca, Idaho, a distance of two hundred and eighty miles. From July 1, 1875, to June 30, 1878, that route was let at $47,000. For the term from 1878 to 1882, it was let at $30,000.

Take the route from Watson's to Deer Lodge, Montana, a distance of one hundred and sixteen miles. From 1875 to 1878 the contract price was $17,750. Under the expedited schedule from July 28 to June 30, 1882, it is $14,591.

Mr. BOOTH. How much was that expedited in point of time?

Mr. TELLER. I am not able to give the time, but it is an expedited service, and still the service costs $3,159 less than under the previous letting.

The route from Helena to Missoula, Montana, is a distance of one hundred and forty miles. From 1875 to 1878 the price was $21,089. I am giving in all these cases the rate per annum. Under the present expedited schedule, from July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1882, the contract price is $18,739.

From Sidney to Deadwood, and from Cheyenne to Horsehead, Dakota, one route being two hundred and fourteen and the other two hundred and ninety-eight miles, the original letting was $80,000. The present pay, with expedited service, is $45,765, a saving of $34,235 per year.

From Eureka to Pioche, Nevada, a distance of two hundred and sixty-seven miles, from March 1, 1875, to June 30, 1878, the contract price was $31,400. Under the present management, from July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1882, the service is let for $30,600.

From Franklin to Helena, Montana, a distance of four hundred and twenty-two miles, from July 1, 1874, to June 30, 1878, the service cost $65,000 a year, and from July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1882, the price is $54,000 a year.

There can be no expedited service of course without an increased price; it cannot be expected. If the service is increased from one trip a week to seven trips a week, we naturally expect that there will be an additional amount of pay; and if that is all that is done, in most cases the pay will not be more than seven times as much, and I think an examination of the increased service here will show that the Department have generally kept within that rule. When you come to the expedited service, it is a little difficult to say what the allowance for that shall be; yet the statute has provided what shall be the ratio and how they shall arrive at it, and in every case that has been presented they have kept within the statute, and have allowed less than the statute would have justified them by the rule that was laid down and that has been on the statute-book, I suppose, for half a century at least; at any rate, it has been so long on the statute-book that I am utterly unable to find when it originated and passed into the statutes, and I am told by a member of the Committee on Appropriations that it has been there for very many years.

When everything is taken into consideration, when you consider the increased business of this country, it is clear that there has been a wise exercise of discretion on the part of the Government. Take the State of Colorado, and I will take that which is familiar, and I might make a dozen illustrations in that State; I will select the town of Leadville. On the 12th day of July, 1877, the postmaster at Leadville was commissioned with an annual salary of $12. Before he made his fourth quarter that year he had five or six clerks, beside the work he did himself, and the last return from the Leadville post-office was a return of more than $40,000. Take the city of Denver, that went from $60,000 in 1877 to $150,000 in 1879. Take the money orders in that section of country—and what is true of Denver will hold good of very many other portions of the State—and I think in proportion to the population all of the money-order offices in the State have grown in importance with Denver. In 1877 the money orders at Denver were $530,000; in 1878, $750,000; in 1879, $1,459,000.

You may take Silver Cliff, and you may take a dozen places that I can mention that when I came into the Senate in December, 1876, had no existence, were unknown even to the people of Colorado, the places where they now are being a bleak, howling wilderness, and they return now a respectable revenue; they return many thousands of dollars to the Government every year. Large and thriving towns have grown up, and their people are swelling the receipts of New York and other great cities. It is there that they buy their newspapers; it is there they get their magazines; it is there they get their merchandise; and all those things go through the mails, fill up the mails, and fill up the Treasury also. If this bill had passed as it came from the House the Leadville route would have been cut down to a weekly service. Leadville, with a population of at least forty thousand, I suppose, would have been left with its weekly mail. That is not a matter merely in the interest of Leadville; that is not a matter merely in the interest of the people of Colorado. Leadville and its vicinity are paying into the coffers of men largely living in the city of New York more than half a million dollars in dividends, clean money, every month of the year. They have some interest in having frequent communication with the source of their wealth. Take Rosita, a town that has grown up within the last two years, with from five to ten thousand people, with some of the largest producing mines in the country, sending its wealth back to the eastern people who have had the enterprise and the good sense to go there and invest, and they are as much interested in the keeping up of this service in its efficiency as the people of Colorado, if not more so. Other portions of Colorado are in the same condition, but I need not mention Colorado alone, because it is true of Utah, and it is true of Dakota, and it is true of other sections of the country that are included within the one hundred and seven routes affected by the bill.

If the amount of money included in the bill is sufficient to keep up this service, as the member of the committee who reported the bill stated, and I think I shall take his word for that, I am satisfied with the amount, but I am not satisfied to put upon the record a condemnation of this Department that has done more for the people that I am attempting to represent here, has done more for the people west of the Mississippi River in this matter than any other Department of the Government. I am not willing to put upon the record what I know to be untrue and what I believe ought not to be charged under any circumstances. That portion of this bill I am very much opposed to.

I think, as I said before, this Department is entitled to great credit, and I think if it has exceeded a sound judgment at all, as it is said it has, it has been in the interest of intelligence; it has been in the interest of the people who have been demanding as the people never before demanded mail service. Look at the list of names signed to the petition that the Senator from Texas presented here yesterday, a list of distinguished gentlemen that had pressed the Department to exercise a discretion that the Government had vested in that Department for half a century; and it would be a remarkable administration, it would possess a class of virtues that I do not want to see any administration that I support possess, that could resist such an array of intelligent talent and such urgent appeals.

Mr. President, we have wanted this service, and when we got it we felt grateful to the administration of public affairs, and the whole people felt that they were being somewhat compensated for the privations that every man must necessarily endure who goes into a new country. And I say to cut it down now is not only unkind but very unwise and detrimental to the public interests, and it ought not to be done.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, yesterday, in the speech of the Senator from Texas, in his citation of the different applications that had been made to the Post-Office Department for the increase of service and the change of mail routes, it appeared that my name was to a number of them. For that reason, aside from the general interest in this proposition of the people that I represent in the Senate, it would seem to be necessary that I should make a few suggestions in regard to this bill to the Senate.

Those applications that I signed are distinctly recollected by myself. I signed them conscientiously, and with a view to the service of the people in the regions of country through which these routes passed. They are entitled to a substantial and beneficial mail service. I did it also conscientiously on my part after an examination of the law, feeling that what was asked for was within the discretion of the Postmaster-General. At the same time that I arrived at that conclusion, I did not do so without some doubt; but that was my interpretation of the law. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] denies that such is the law. The Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY], as well as the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER], with equal emphasis, insists that it is the law. There are honest differences of opinion among gentlemen. The Senator from Texas being the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, it became necessarily his duty to examine this question. We note a wide and marked difference between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Texas upon this proposition. The Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General insisted, in response to the Senator from Kentucky, that these are matters within their discretion.

Now, let the Senate consider what it all amounts to at last. It is simply, as was clearly stated by the Senator from Texas yesterday, a mere allegation of an abuse of discretion in the simplest form that you can use the word "abuse," a mere mistake as to the existence or exercise of that discretion under the law. If the Department has made this error of judgment, has exercised a discretion, in other words, that did not belong to it under the law, the head of the Department did it under the pressure of gentlemen interested for the benefit of the country, and he made the error on the side of the wishes of the people to be benefited by these routes. That is all there is of it at last. No tribunal can punish him, no tribunal can do more than say he exercised a discretion which did not belong to him; but we will not brand him with infamy, we will not declare him unworthy of the trust he holds, because he has exercised this discretion as he has. I feel sure that never in the exercise of any trust for any length of time, much less the tremendous trust the Postmaster-General has in his hands, has it been executed without some abuse of discretion—no, that is not the proper expression—without exercising a discretion that does not under the law belong to him. Here has been an exercise of it, if it all, through mistake, on the application of gentlemen all over the country for the benefit of a large number of people and for the good of the service distributed beyond the Mississippi River. He certainly is not to blame, he certainly is not to be accused of committing any error that would make him amenable to any process at the hands of Congress or any tribunal in the country.

In the clear statement made yesterday by the Senator who has the bill in charge [Mr. WALLACE] it was shown that the shearing process of the House shall not pass the Senate and that substantially the differences between gentlemen on this proposition are accommodated; that is, this bill as amended appropriates sufficient for this service, and so far it is satisfactory to me. Yet I have my doubts, notwithstanding the showing made by the Senator from Kentucky, whether it is sufficient or not. But then substantially that is agreed upon. And yet, while in one part of the bill we say to the Postmaster-General "You may have what is necessary," we say in another breath, "You are not worthy to manage this trust." Then what have we accomplished? We really do put in his hands money enough for this service, and yet we say in one part of the bill that he is unworthy to control and manage it. It is inconsistent upon its face. It is improper for that reason. But there are other reasons to my mind which are conclusive why it should not be done.

In the first place, after examining the precedents, I find that it is not the custom when we vote an appropriation or a deficiency of an appropriation to a Department, to condemn in that bill, either by preamble or in the body of the bill, the officers intrusted with the disbursement of that money. It is sufficient that the law-making power knows that the deficiency exists, and that it ought to be supplied, without incorporating into the bill that supplies the deficiency a charge against the very person who is to disburse the money appropriated to supply the deficiency.

In the second place, is it a proper charge under any state of the case? Suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the powerful statement of the Senator from Kentucky is correct; suppose I yield that it is true; is this the proper mode to reach the Department? Is it proper to undertake to condemn the Postmaster-General in this manner? It is not. The Senator from Kentucky coolly and calmly would not contend that you should condemn the Department in this manner. It is unknown to the laws of the country; it is unknown to parliamentary usage and parliamentary practice.

But over and above all, let us see the condition in which the Senate would place itself by adopting this measure as it stands. The Senator from Kentucky says that the Postmaster-General has willfully and stubbornly and wantonly disregarded and violated the law in the premises. If that be true the Postmaster-General is liable to impeachment; the grand jury sitting at the other end of the Capitol must impeach him, and this body must try him. Now, it is proposed to try him in advance of articles of impeachment, in advance of the articles to be preferred against him by the managers. If the House should impeach him for this wanton abuse of his power and this bill were voted as it stands, the Senate would be incompetent to try him. They could not in self-respect try the Postmaster-General upon articles of impeachment, for we should have condemned him without due process in advance, we should have condemned him in a preamble to an appropriation bill, and condemned him to all intents and purposes unheard, contrary to the law of parliamentary procedure and contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, I submit that this is not the proper way to deal with this great subject. The bill is correct in itself; it appropriates a sufficient sum of money, though, I fear, grudgingly, if not stingily. The service is secured—that great service that is important to the people beyond the Mississippi River; the contractors may go their way; but it is not proper, it is not fair, it is not law, and when it is not law that is enough, to condemn the Postmaster-General or the head of any other Department in this way.

I give notice that at the proper time I shall move to strike out from the preamble the four lines beginning with the word "caused," in the fourth line, down to the word "appropriations," at the end of the seventh line, inclusive; and I hope the Senator from Kentucky, now that he has made his speech, able and powerful as he always does speak, will consent that those words in the preamble shall go out.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I propose to consume a very short time upon this subject, and I do so for the reason that I think the Postmaster-General has been unfairly and unjustly dealt with.

What is the trouble? At the last session of the last Congress we appropriated a certain sum of money to be applied to the star-route mail service for the current fiscal year ending on the 30th of June next. That was the sum of $5,900,000. It was a gross sum of money to be applied to a particular service; it was not an appropriation of $5,900,000 that by law was to be apportioned around among existing mail contracts, but it was a gross sum to be applied to the star mail service in the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Right there, may I put a passing question? Was it not both for service then existing and for service that might afterward be created?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes, sir. The matter of what shall be the star mail service is, and has been for years, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General. There is not a single mail contract let for railway mail service, steamboat mail service, or star mail service, that does not contain a provision in itself that it is in the power of the Postmaster-General at any time to annul it and set it aside. More than that, the same law authorizes the Postmaster-General to establish new service upon any post-route that we by law create, or to increase existing service; so that the whole matter is left by law in his hands.

He was authorized to spend the sum of $5,900,000 in managing, as he believed for the best interest of the country, that portion of our mail service which is called the star service, which is the service outside railways and steamboats.

It has been argued here as if he were compelled by law to carry on every existing contract at the time the appropriation was made. That is not the law, as I understand; it never has been the law, as I understand. I venture to say that there has not been a year in which we have had a Post-Office Department at all in magnitude equal to what it is now in which in every State in the Union the star mail service has not been increased or diminished as in the judgment of the Postmaster-General it was deemed important that it should be so increased or diminished.

If I am right in thus understanding the law as it stands, it follows that the Postmaster-General had the right to order new routes, to increase the service on established routes, and to expedite the mail over them. He had the right to do that, but he was required by the law referred to again and again by the Senator from Kentucky to keep within the sum of $5,900,000 in doing it. And in order to keep himself within that sum he might curtail the existing star mail service in portions of the country where he believed the public interest would not suffer by doing it in order to enable him to have the funds thus saved to apply to the star mail service in other portions of the country where it had not been established or where it was required to be increased or expedited. If I am wrong in thus understanding the law, then my argument based upon it is certainly wrong.

After this appropriation was made, in the judgment of the Postmaster-General it became necessary for the public service to increase the amount of star mail service in the Western States and Territories, to establish new routes, to increase the number of times within a week that a mail should be carried over those routes, and to expedite the time in which the mail should be carried over those routes. In his judgment the public interest demanded that that should be done. Was he not the person to determine whether it should be done or not, under our law as it stands? He did believe that it should be done. So believing, what should he have done otherwise in order to have subserved the public interest? He might have estimated what the new service that he deemed necessary for the public interest in that portion of the country would require, and he might have curtailed the existing star service in the older States to an amount that would furnish him with the funds necessary to establish the new service where it was needed. That it would have been competent for him to do.

He might have done what he did do. He might have said in his own mind "The public interest requires this increase in the service in the new sections of the country. I will order it to be done under the discretionary power I have; I will not decrease the amount of service in the older portions of the country where service already exists, unless I am compelled to do so. When the Congress of the United States meets I will submit to them the question whether or not this new service was required and ask them, if in their judgment they so believe, to furnish the means to pay for it. If Congress decides against me, if Congress decides that this work was not needed to be done, that it should not be paid for, then I shall have to fall back upon the power that I already have in my hands to curtail in other portions of the country the service existing there to pay for this that I deem to be just as essential in the new portions of the country as the existing service is in the older portions; and so I will keep myself within the limits of the law which provides that I shall not spend more than $5,900,000 in money, or enter into contracts that will require the expenditure of more money than that." That is what he chose to do; that is what he has done; and now it seems to me the question addressed to the sound sense and the judgment of Congress is, was the work that he authorized to be done in these western States and Territories needed or not?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator might add, and did he increase the service too extravagantly?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is a portion of the subject that I do not propose to argue.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is the important point.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. None of these routes is within the State in which I live. They are within the State of Colorado, the State of Texas, and within Territories that are not represented here. The Senators from those States are much more familiar with those questions than I, and I do not propose knowingly to argue questions that I do not to some extent understand.

Mr. BOOTH. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me one moment to answer the question of the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BOOTH. I simply want to put one statement on record in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia and to a great deal that was said by the Senator from Kentucky in reference to pet contractors and reckless, extravagant, and arbitrary contracts. The fact is to-day that the service on the star routes is better and more expeditiously performed than ever before. The mail matter carried is largely greater than ever before. The cost of everything purchased by the contractor is higher than it has been for five years, and the cost of transportation to-day per mile is lower than it has been at any time within twenty-five years, with the exception of a single year.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then how is it, if the Senator will allow me—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If it does not take too long.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. How is it that we have a greater deficiency now, a greater amount paid for mail service than ever before? As the Senator from California has said, there is a greater amount of mail matter in transit. The whole revenue from that is used, of course, by the Post-Office Department, and a great deal more money is being asked from year to year to be given to that Department from the Treasury of the United States than formerly. Yet the Senator says that the mails are going now with more regularity and with less expense, when the truth is, when you come to look at the facts as to the amount taken from the Treasury for mail service, that the cost has been largely increasing. It was comparatively a few years ago that the mail service paid its own expenses, and now when we come to the present year the deficit is larger than it has been for many years.

Mr. MAXEY. When was it that the revenues of the Department paid the expenses, I ask the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In 1866 the Department more than paid its expenses, and along about 1850 and for several years it was a source of revenue to the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. The whole service taken altogether?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The whole service.

Mr. BLAINE. Of the whole United States?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Of the whole United States.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is certainly mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If I am mistaken the figures of the official reports are mistaken. I have got them here.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I like to talk about one thing at a time, and I propose to continue in the line I am on so far as I am able. I have said already that I have not examined the changes in the contracts made in the new routes in the new western country, but I have formed in my own mind an opinion as to whether or not the items allowed for work are too much or too little. I know that Senators here representing States in which those routes were ought to be, and I had no doubt they were, much better informed than I was upon that subject. But I will allude very briefly to one route to show that there are two sides to some of these matters alluded to so eloquently and so frequently by the Senator from Kentucky. Take any particular route. The service over it under the original contract was, we will say, once a week, and the time a certain number of days. It is changed to three times a week, and a much less period is allowed for carrying the mail than was before. He gives the figures of the original contract and the figures allowed under the new contract, and they look to be out of proportion. He doubtless has examined them to know whether they are out of proportion or not, or he would not say they were; but it is possible he may have overlooked in some particulars all the facts. Let me read here a statement in regard to one of these routes in Montana Territory. Whether the statement be true or not I do not know.

Mr. BECK. What route is that, please?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is a route from Rock Creek on the Union Pacific Railroad by Fort Fetterman and Fort McKinney to Fort Custer, Montana—three hundred and fifty-eight miles.

Mr. BECK. I did not allude to that, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will give the statement made in regard to it. The contractor says:

I commenced the service April 14, 1879, tri-weekly, with eight days' time each way, pay, $10,507.25. The long time was objectionable. I was, however, compelled to use it in order to keep within the mail pay.

Petitions and requests from all parties interested were sent to the Department praying for daily service and a shorter time. June 11, 1879, the Department ordered four additional trips per week at a cost of $14,009.66—

Which I presume is in exact proportion to the former price allowed for three trips a week—and an expedition of time from eight days to three days and three hours, at a cost of $64,251.21 per annum.

That is, the contractor was required to run in three days and three hours over a route to run which he was allowed eight days under the original contract, and for that expedited time he was allowed the sum of $64,251.21 per annum. That looks out of proportion. A person merely reading that and looking no further would say that certainly is out of proportion, but look at the facts as given. He says:

While I only required eight stations for eight days' time tri-weekly, twenty-four stations were required for three days' time daily. I built fifteen of the twenty-four stations at my own cost, and assisted in building the others. They were stocked with hay and grain to last to June 1, 1880.

Corn is all shipped from Omaha seven hundred miles by railroad, and then hauled the length of the route, three hundred and fifty-eight miles. It averages me $2.80 per bushel, delivered along the route. Hay is cut on the line, and costs from $15 to $30 per ton; having often to haul it fifty miles.

I have two hundred horses and mules, with an entire outfit of hacks, buckboards, harness, &c., now in use on this three hundred and fifty-eight miles of road, put there at great expense to meet the service ordered by the Post-Office Department.

It is easy to see when you compel a man to establish new stations and buy the additional stock and outfit that would be required to run the route in three days and three hours instead of eight days, that expediting it increased the expense much beyond the real increase of the number of trips. The Senator from Kentucky may know, the Senator from West Virginia may know, that this is out of a due proportion for the increased service, but I do not know it, and because I do not know it, I will not condemn any one for having given it.

But to come back to where I was. The question in my mind is, Is this new service that the Postmaster-General has put in our new States and Territories needed for the public benefit? If it is needed, why should they not have it? What are we here for, I should be glad to know? What do our constituents send us here for, if not to see that the public interests are served where they can be served? The Senator from Kentucky may tell me that when the appropriation of $5,900,000 was made it was not known to the Post-Office Department that this additional service would be needed. Very possibly it was not known. They do not know everything. It was not known to the Committee on Appropriations, when they appropriated $5,900,000, that this additional service would be needed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let me say to the Senator that the Committee on Appropriations gave the Postmaster-General down to the very cent that he asked.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. They gave him the full amount asked for.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understand that perfectly, but there is this about that—

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let me say a little further to the Senator, that in the Postmaster-General's report sent to Congress at this session in December, not one word is said to Congress about a deficiency, and there is no intimation that Congress had not appropriated enough money.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understand that perfectly well; but that does not touch the question whether this work is needed or not. That is the question. The Postmaster-General, when he made the report to the Committee on Appropriations a year ago, did not perhaps know very well what the service would require. There are a great many things the Postmaster-General does not know; a great many things he has yet to learn.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator allow me a moment? When the service was appropriated for to the full amount required the question which the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from West Virginia wish to have considered specially is whether the discretion in the Postmaster-General and his subordinates was not abused when he expended in nine months what ought to have been done for twelve months. In other words, taking the route which the Senator from Kentucky has given, when the Postmaster-General started at a cost of $2,000 in round numbers and is now paying $70,000 for the same service, are we not to take that into consideration?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am only arguing that at least I did not suppose the Postmaster-General knew anything.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. He knew, however, that he was paying these tremendous amounts over and above the letting of the contracts.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will come to that. I am not to be diverted from the point I am on by any side issue. I suppose when the Postmaster-General made that estimate to the Appropriations Committee, if he had known that this additional service would be required, he would have estimated for it, and I have supposed that he did not know it; I have supposed an almost unsupposable thing, that the Appropriations Committee did not know it. They are supposed to know everything, but somehow or other when they were making provision for this part of the governmental service a year ago they did not know that this additional service would be required.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. They had no right to know it. Let me say that the Postmaster-General estimates and the committee is instructed to go by his estimates. If we had done otherwise the Senator himself would have complained.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am a remarkably good-natured man, but I know that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will have the privilege of closing this debate and correcting any error I may have fallen into.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Thank you, sir, I will not disturb you further.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Being somewhat of a modest man, and not used to public debate, I may be embarrassed somewhat if I am continually interrupted. What I was going on to remark is this: The Postmaster-General, I presume, did not know that this service would be needed at the time he made the estimate of $5,900,000. I presume if he had known that the service would be needed he would have estimated for it. I presume, also, (I hope the Committee on Appropriations will pardon me for the presumption,) that the Committee on Appropriations did not know it, or they would have provided for it without the estimate of the Postmaster-General, because I cannot suppose that the Appropriations Committee of this Senate or of the House would allow the public interest to suffer because some departmental officer did not inform them that unless appropriations were made it would suffer, if they have the means of knowing it themselves.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. In reply to a question which I put to the Senator from West Virginia, when he had interrupted the Senator from Iowa by stating so positively that the Post-Office Department was self-sustaining, when I asked him to name the year, he pitched on the year 1866.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let me say to my friend that I may have missed the year.

Mr. MAXEY. In the year 1866 the revenues were $14,386,936; the expenditures were $15,352,079. In the years laid down here from 1790 to 1879 there are not six where the expenditures were not in excess of the appropriations. One of those is the year 1835 where the revenues were $14,556,159 and the expenditures were $13,694,728, to which if the Senator will please to add the salaries paid to postmasters, $3,383,382, he will find it amounts to seventeen million and odd dollars, largely more than the revenues, and so he will find all through these years from 1790 the Post-Office never has been a self-sustaining Department, and for many years it never was intended to be self-sustaining.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I misquoted the year; that is all. It is the year before, the year 1865 and not 1866; and in 1864.

Mr. MAXEY. And then the salaries of the postmasters were over $3,000,000, and with that addition the expenditures largely exceeded the revenue.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That you cannot add.

Mr. MAXEY. Oh, yes, you can.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have a table showing the exact figures which I will publish.*

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I will come back to the point I was trying to explain to the Senate. I do not like to repeat, but I have to do so. I have said that it is to be presumed that when the Postmaster-General estimated and when the Appropriations Committee made the appropriation of $5,900,000 he was not aware of the vast changes that would occur before the year ran around in our Western States and Territories. If he had anticipated then, he doubtless would have estimated higher than he did. The Appropriations Committee did not anticipate them, for if they had, I was arguing that they would have appropriated enough money, although the Postmaster-General might not have estimated for it, because I was saying that we could not believe that the Committee on Appropriations would allow the public interests to suffer because some officer of the Government had not made the proper estimates and they knew it. It was unknown then to the Postmaster-General and unknown (improbable as that may seem) to the Appropriations Committee that a sum additional to the $5,900,000 would be needed. But as time passed on it was found that great changes were occurring in those Territories, and that new routes must be established, more frequent trips allowed over the older routes and shorter time allowed over the older routes. It was found out that the public interest required that to be done.

What had the Postmaster-General then to do as a faithful public officer? Was he to see that the public interest in this regard was served or left unserved? Was he to come to Congress when it met and say to it, "Here, I have found what I did not know; I have found what you did not know; that the public interest required this additional expenditure to be made, and believing that I can satisfy you that the public interest did require it, and believing that if you are so satisfied you will appropriate the money to do it, I have gone on and had the work done and the public interest served by it."

Now, that is all the question there is. If you do not choose to do it, do not do it, and the Postmaster-General will throw himself upon the power given to him by the law in cutting down the service in other parts of the country, and bring his expenditures for the star service within your $5,900,000. He will bring his expenditures within that amount; but you will howl instead of the men living west of the Mississippi River. That is the difference. It will be a matter of little importance, perhaps, to many that the men living west of the Mississippi River should go without this mail service for months and months, but when you come to bring the curtailment to yourselves you will find that it will make a very considerable difference whether you have mail facilities or not.

I say that, so far as the means I have at hand of judging enable me to say, in doing what he has done the Postmaster-General has shown himself to be, what I believe him to be, an honest, upright, faithful, capable public servant. He has done his duty well, and the question with us is whether we shall do our duty as well as he has done his. He has seen to it that the public interest has been served, and we are asked whether we will see to it that so far as it depends upon us that interest shall also be served.

A few words more. Something was said by the Senator from Kentucky yesterday in regard to what he claimed to be conflicting statements made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, as I understood him, and the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, who is the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, as I understand. Am I right in that?

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, that is right.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It was claimed, as I understood, by the Senator from Kentucky—his remarks are not yet in print, and I may not quote accurately the substance of them—that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General had not dealt ingenuously in his communication to Congress stating the necessity for an additional appropriation, that he had stated it at a sum much larger than was really required, and was thus seeking by a false pretense almost, as I understood the Senator from Kentucky, to get an appropriation from Congress of a larger amount than was necessary. Let me read a few sentences from the communication of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

I have the honor to state that the appropriation for inland mail transportation on star routes, for the current fiscal year, has proved insufficient to meet the wants of the rapidly growing service.

The annual cost of the service now in operation is $7,620,004, while the appropriation is but $5,900,000. Not only will the present appropriation allow no increase of mail facilities during the year, but it will be necessary to curtail the existing service in order to bring its cost within the appropriation.

Believing that this cannot be done without great injury to many deserving communities, and further that pressing necessity exists for increased service in many places, I venture to suggest a method of relief.

During the four fiscal years last past, namely, 1876 to 1879, there has been covered back into the Treasury of unexpended balances of appropriations for inland mail transportation, $3,965,468.27.

That is, appropriations that have been made for this particular kind of service, but not expended. Now he ventures to suggest:

In view of this fact, I have the honor to request your recommendation to Congress—

The letter is to the Postmaster-General—that about one-half this amount, say $2,000,000, be reappropriated for mail transportation on star routes. This will enable the Department to maintain the present service, and besides afford a margin for reasonable and necessary increase during the remaining half of the fiscal year.

The communication does not go upon the ground that the sum of $2,000,000 was required to meet existing contracts, but it goes upon the ground that it might be required to meet existing contracts, and to meet additional contracts which might be required by the public interest as well. The Senator from Kentucky says that the report of the Sixth Auditor shows that the statement of the necessities of the service given in some place as being $1,700,000, I think, was untrue, because the report of the Sixth Auditor showed that for the two preceding quarters less sums had been needed than it was supposed would be needed for the remaining two quarters.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Iowa is mistaken. The Sixth Auditor gives us the sums actually expended for the past two quarters and what is necessary to conduct the service to the end of the current fiscal year upon the basis of the contracts as they actually exist.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes; I understand that. That is the report of the Sixth Auditor; but let us see how the two reports are made out. I assume it to be true that taking the contracts as they stand they will require the sum of $1,700,000—I do not remember the precise amount.

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir; the Senator from Iowa is mistaken. The report made to us by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury is upon the basis of the contracts as they now exist.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will explain myself so that the Senator from Pennsylvania will understand me. I say taking the contracts as they stand, and taking the sums of money required by those contracts to be paid on their face, it will require a larger sum than the sum named by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury.

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Let me explain. The amounts as shown by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury are the amounts of the contract prices, less the fines and less the penalties.

Mr. BECK. No, sir, that is not true.

Mr. WALLACE. That is a mistake.

Mr. BECK. There is not a dollar of penalty deducted for the last six months of the year in his account, and he says so.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then there is a question of fact upon which the Senators from Kentucky and Pennsylvania and West Virginia and myself differ. We shall have to ascertain which of us is misinformed and who is well-informed.

Mr. BECK. The Sixth Auditor testified to the truth of that statement.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have stated my understanding. Of course nobody wants to misrepresent either the Sixth Auditor or the Second Assistant Postmaster-General; but I understand, and I repeat it, that the statements made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General were made upon the basis of the amounts of money required to be spent to meet the face of the contracts, and that the estimates made by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury are made upon the settlement of accounts from which are deducted the fines and penalties.

Mr. BECK. For the first six months he gives the amount of fines and penalties as $101,000, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General gives the same amount, and shows that he knew it to a cent; and for the last six months not one dollar of fines is deducted according to the Sixth Auditor's statement.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Let us get at this thing exactly. Suppose a certain number of contracts require upon their face the payment of $1,500,000; that is, if the contractor performs his duty according to the terms of his contract he is entitled to receive during a year

* The following is the table referred to by Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia:

$1,500,000, but if he fails to perform his contract according to its terms, if he fails to make a trip that he is required to make, or if he takes more time than that in which he is required to make his trip, then the Post-Office Department deducts from his contract a certain sum for every failure to make a trip, and a certain sum for every time in which he does not make a trip within the time his contract calls for.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to read the letter from the Sixth Auditor in order to show him the exact position?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am merely stating my judgment in regard to this matter and the facts as I understand them. I will look into the matter, and if I find that I have been misinformed I shall of course correct what I say; but I am stating what I understand to be the fact.

Mr. WALLACE. But this will correct the Senator at once.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Very well; let us hear what it is.

Mr. WALLACE. The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 2, 1880.

SIR: In compliance with your request of yesterday, I have the honor to transmit herewith statements showing by States and quarters the paid and unpaid amounts chargeable to the appropriation for star transportation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, according to the contracts, orders, &c., on file in this office.

In addition to the total amount shown in this statement, the sum of $40,000 should be added, being the amount paid for the supply of special officers.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. B. LILLEY, Acting Auditor.

HON. JAMES B. BECK,
United States Senate.

Then follows the statement in detail, which shows the amount actually expended and to be expended according to the contracts and the orders adding expedition or increased trips on file in the office on the 2d of March, 1880.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Am I mistaken in this statement: A contractor agrees to carry the mail between A and B, two terminal points, and he gets $150,000 a year by the face of his contract for doing it; he is to carry a mail once a week, or twice a week, or three times a week, and he is to carry it on each trip in a certain number of hours. Now, if he drops out a trip, the proportionate amount is taken from his contract price, is it not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is so, is it not?

Mr. WALLACE. But it is not deducted in the statement furnished to us.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But I am asking the question. Under that contract itself he is liable to have deducted for every trip he loses the proportionate value of that trip?

Mr. WALLACE. That is true.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then, further, if in addition to that he fails to make a trip within the time limited by the terms of the contract, he is liable for doing it, and that is to be taken from the amount which he is to receive on the face of his contract, is it not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. That would diminish instead of increasing the Auditor's statement.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is the case every quarter. Now, the amount that will be deducted from a contractor's pay for the first quarter of a year cannot be determined until that quarter has ceased and the accounts come in, and they are made up during the second quarter, and during the second quarter the deduction is made. Is it not so?

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me I will say that therefore it is that from the 1st day of January till the 30th day of June the statement as made by the Sixth Auditor embraces the whole amount as per contracts, without a dollar being deducted on account of possible fines; and with that fact existing it still amounts only to a deficiency of $1,155,000, instead of $1,720,000, or $1,500,000, as the Second Assistant Postmaster-General stated to us, which was proved not to be true.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then I am misinformed, Mr. President. I think it possible that the Senator from Kentucky is himself mistaken in regard to the facts. I shall endeavor to inform myself.

Mr. BECK. There it is.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is possible for the Senator from Kentucky to be mistaken as well as the rest of us. It is a very violent presumption, I know; but I have reason to believe that the estimates made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General were made upon the face of the contracts, and that the estimates made by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury were made upon the settled accounts after the deductions had been made for failure of trips, and for fines and penalties. As it is impossible to know in advance of any quarter what failures of trips will be made or what fines and penalties will be incurred during that time, it is impossible for any man to estimate with accuracy, to do more than guess, what will have to be paid out during a coming quarter.

Mr. BECK. The Senator will allow me one word. The statement of the Sixth Auditor shows in so many words that in the statement he makes to us he deducts fines as ascertained to the amount of $101,000 from the 1st July to the 31st of December, 1879, and he gives the whole amount of the contracts without deducting a dollar for fines from the 1st of January to the 1st of June next; and he sends this to us.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will read from the testimony before the Senator's committee a statement made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. BECK. I admit it; and I assert that that statement he made to us demanding $1,720,004 as the cost of the actual service was absolutely untrue.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Very well. Let me read what he says. In reply to a question by Senator WALLACE, Mr. Brady says this:

Mr. BRADY. There is an apparent discrepancy, and always is at the end of every year, between my reports and the Sixth Auditor's; and some gentlemen, I understand, who have taken the Sixth Auditor's estimate of what will be the probable deficiency of the year, have made unfavorable comments, and suggested that I was asking for more money than I needed. The Sixth Auditor's statement of the actual amounts paid for service is never a correct basis for making an estimate, as his statement includes the deduction of all fines and deductions imposed upon contractors for poor service or failures to perform trips, and all that sort of thing, and during the last two quarters they have been running very heavily.

That is the statement made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. It may be that he has been lying about it, as the Senator from Kentucky says. I do not know, but I do not presume that against a public officer in the absence of proof.

Mr. BECK. I do not care about using the word "lying" myself. I do say, however, that the Sixth Auditor's statement makes it absolutely certain that this officer's assumption that there was an actual deficiency of $1,720,004, as he officially certified on the 8th day of December, is not true, and I do not believe the Sixth Auditor lies.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Let me read a little further.

We adopted a very stringent rule a year ago in the inspection division, that where we expedited and increased the service, contractors had to perform it up to the strict letter of the contract. They must be on schedule time everywhere, and they must perform first-class service; and where they do not do it, we put on the fines and make heavy deduction. The consequence is, that while our contract prices call for contracts that would bring us out with a deficiency of nearly $1,700,000, as I stated, the Sixth Auditor, basing his statement upon the payments for the last two quarters ending September 30 and December 31, brings out the probable deficiency as $1,297,198.

That is what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General says.

Mr. BECK. And that is absolutely untrue, because he brings out a deficiency of $1,155,000, and yet told us it was $1,500,000.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that I would much rather believe that there was a misunderstanding between the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury than believe that any gentleman occupying the position that either of them occupies told a deliberate untruth to this Congress. I do not believe that I am called upon here in the discharge of my duties to presume that any man holding a public position tells a deliberate untruth unless it be known, and I should be very backward to make a charge of that kind against any public officer who stands well before the country unless I have proof of it, so that it cannot be a mere misunderstanding.

Mr. BECK. Allow me one word, and I am done with this matter. It impresses me that the Senator from Iowa is endeavoring to make the Senate believe that the Sixth Auditor had not told the truth—

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. BECK. When he said that the total amount was $7,005,000. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General stated that the Sixth Auditor, basing his statement upon the payments made, brought out a probable deficiency of $1,297,000, when he had the fact before his face and the paper in his hand that the Auditor made out a deficiency of $1,155,000 instead of $1,297,000; and I merely desired to say that I did not believe the Sixth Auditor was a liar. That is all.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not believe either of them has lied. I do not believe any man occupying the position either of these gentlemen occupies would come before the Congress of the United States and deliberately state that which he knows to be untrue and which he knows can be proven to be untrue. I do not believe that all the honesty or all the integrity of the public officials of the United States resides in the Congress of the United States. I believe there are men outside of Congress holding office under the Government of the United States who are just as honest men and have the interests of this country at heart just as much as any man who holds a seat on this floor; and where there is a possibility or probability of a misunderstanding between men as to what is or what is not a matter of fact, I will not take it to be that either of them has made an untruthful statement, where there is a chance that an apparent discrepancy may arise from a misunderstanding. Of course my rule in this matter for my own conduct is no rule for any other Senator in regard to his conduct. But we should complain bitterly, and we should have a right to complain bitterly, if persons commenting upon our public action here were to charge every misunderstanding among us to deliberate untruthfulness on the part of those who might differ in opinion.

I have now said all I desire to say in regard to this matter. I have endeavored to show that in doing what he has done the Postmaster-General has done what an honest, faithful, capable public servant should have done, what I am satisfied I would have done had I been in his place, because I would have had, as he had, faith to believe that if I could show to the Congress of the United States that Congress in making appropriations had failed in this particular to make such appropriations as the public interest required should be made and I had had the public interest at heart, I would have felt the utmost confidence that Congress would have come forward promptly for the doing of that which the public service required to be done. I would not have held that I was violating the law in doing it. I do not believe that the Postmaster-General was violating the law in doing it. It has been my fortune in the State where I live to serve the people of that State both in a legislative and in an executive capacity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Their fortune, it would be better to say.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. While I was serving them in an executive capacity I did once and again without any authority of law, and according to my personal recollection in violation of law, expend their money, not taking it from the treasury, because I could not get it, but I incurred expenses once and again and again that I believe I would have been derelict in my duty as the chief executive of my State if I had not incurred, although there was no law for it, and a general law prohibited the expenditure of any money not appropriated by law.

Let me instance a case. One of the penitentiaries in my State—the only one we had at that time—accidentally had a fire in it; all the workshops were burned down. Our legislative sessions are biennial, and some eighteen months would have expired before we could have a new session of the General Assembly. If the shops had not been rebuilt our convicts would have been compelled to stay in their cells idle nearly all the time. I took the responsibility of going to work and building those shops; I had no authority of law for doing it at all, but I had it done in as short a space of time as I could get it done, and I put the men to work again. By the time the Legislature met they had earned a large part of what the shops cost. The Legislature indorsed my act and said, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Mr. EDMUNDS. But as a general rule you would not hold that it was wise, except in an extreme emergency, to do that thing.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No; but I do hold that occasions arise when a man fails to do what he ought to do if he is not willing to take some little responsibility.

Let me give another case. During one of my terms of service there, a riot broke out in one part of our State. It was under peculiar circumstances. Some ten or fifteen hundred misguided men got together and produced a great alarm in a certain section of the State. The sheriff of the county where it occurred lost his head; he was not the man for the emergency; and I had to go to work and did without following the due process of law (because there was not time to do it)—called out ten companies of soldiers and put two pieces of artillery there, and the result was that there was not a soul hurt and the men scattered and went to their homes peaceably and quietly. I, of course, had to incur expense in doing it. The General Assembly when they met said that I had done very well, and they said, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

I believe, Mr. President, that the law as it stands on our statute-book prohibiting an expenditure of any money not appropriated by law or the making of any contract for any purpose not provided for by law, is in some respects a good thing, but in some respects it works badly. It is like almost everything provided by human intelligence; it is not perfect. I may some day give my ideas about that and what I think would be a remedy for some difficulties.

Mr. BLAINE. If I do not interrupt my friend, I would suggest that we are getting our RECORDS printed every day now in absolute defiance of law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is an aggravation of the offense. [Laughter.]

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I intend to vote for this bill, but I intend to vote to strike out the preamble, which I believe to be grossly unjust and grossly injurious to a faithful, honest, and capable public servant.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, as almost the entire debate has been upon the preamble and not upon the bill, and as I believe the Senate is almost unanimous upon the provisions of the bill, I rise to state what the committee have decided to do. The Senator from Iowa has just stated that he intended to vote for the bill, but did not like the preamble. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer what I shall send to the desk and have read for information, which, if adopted, as I hope it will be—and I have no doubt the Senate will be unanimous in adopting it—will obviate the necessity of the preamble; and the committee then direct me to move to strike out the preamble. That being so, and there being a pressing necessity for the passage of the bill, not only for the Post-Office deficiency but also for the printing, (an amendment is to be offered to this bill to help the printing,) I hope we shall come to a vote. I had intended to review some of the remarks of gentlemen, but desiring a vote, and hoping it will come soon, I shall forbear. I send to the desk the amendment to which I have alluded, to be read for information, which is to take the place of the preamble, as far as the committee is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add:

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed as a ratification of any unlawful act or omission of any officer of the United States, or affect any proceedings therefor.

Mr. BLAINE. Does my honorable friend state that that is from the committee?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A majority of the committee direct me to offer this not exactly in the shape of but really as a substitute for the preamble. We all know the bill must be acted on before the preamble.

Mr. BLAINE. I am entirely in favor of striking out the preamble and entirely opposed to putting that on. What the honorable Senator states is correct or he would not state it, that a majority of the committee authorized him to offer that. I dissent from it as one of the minority of the committee, and shall express my dissent.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator of course understands that I consulted him among other members.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly; and the Senator understood me as dissenting.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A majority of the committee directed me to offer this in the nature of a substitute, though it is not in order to act on the preamble until after the bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations in line 3, section 1, to strike out "nine hundred and seventy" and insert "eleven hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is in section 1, line 8, after the word "year," to strike out all down to and including the word "number," in line 19, as follows:

At or within contract prices as they existed on February 1, 1880: Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year for expediting the delivery of mails on any such route, at the rate of more than $2,500 per annum, the compensation for expedited service on such route shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract, on and after the 1st day of March, 1880; and nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the reduction of the number of trips per week over any such route below the present number.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 21, after the word "service," to insert "or increase of trips;" so as to read:

During the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service or increase of trips on any postal star route shall be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what a star route is? It may have been stated several times, but this seems to be a proper time to make the inquiry again if it has been made before. This says "expediting of service or increase of trips on any postal star route." I have read the statutes of the United States with some care several times, and I do not remember to have seen that expression before. What is a postal star route?

Mr. WALLACE. This is the language of the bill as it came from the House, the Senator from Vermont will understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am speaking of the statutes. What I wish to know is what is a postal star route?

Mr. WALLACE. The custom of the Department, as I have already said, indicates all other modes of transportation than those by steamboat or railroad as star service.

Mr. MAXEY. I will answer the question of the Senator from Vermont. In the very appropriation bill under which we now act there is an item "for transportation on star routes, $5,900,000."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is an appropriation bill. I am speaking of the organic body of the law.

Mr. MAXEY. Still it is a statute of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We may appropriate for building a railroad to the moon; but that appropriation has gone by.

Mr. MAXEY. This is an appropriation for star routes under that statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And I am just as ignorant as before. What is a star route?

Mr. WALLACE. It is certainly not defined by statute, but it is by the practice of the Department. It is well understood there, and has been for a number of years, and, I presume, the Senator from Vermont understands it as well as the rest of us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but I do. I want all of us to understand it.

Mr. WALLACE. It means any other mode of transportation of the mails than by steamboat or railroad, and the Departments so construe the term.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With that authoritative definition I am satisfied.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope that this amendment in line 21 reported by the committee will not be adopted. It will work very great injustice indeed to the western portion of my State, and in fact to the western portion of Nebraska and to all portions of the Territories where new settlement is constantly going on. According to this bill we take up this service just where it is, arrest it just where it is, provide for carrying it on as it is, and prevent any further increase for the residue of this fiscal year. The increase of population during the remaining months of this year will be as great as during any similar period for many years past, and we propose to cut off the people who have not been fortunate enough to have had an increase provided for heretofore, and say that for the next five months they shall not have any increase at all.

Mr. EATON. Only three months.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, if it is only three months the principle is the same. The fact is that hungry people go out from Connecticut and all other portions of the Eastern States carrying with them their principles and their desires for mail facilities. They want the daily papers and they want mail facilities just as much during these three months as during any other three months of the year.

Mr. EATON. They can wait.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand there is a very general disposition to let people out in that country wait; but the people in that country are not as much disposed to wait as others are to have them wait. In the western portion of my State there are at least thirty thousand people that have no mail service whatever except such as they provide themselves with. I have a letter here on my table which I received to-day from the northwest corner of the northwest county of that State, representing the urgent necessity for mail service in that section. In very many portions of that State also there are weekly mails which should be now daily mails, very many more that should be semi-weekly, very many more that should be tri-weekly; but those people have to be postponed because of a little spasm of economy that has now come to afflict Congress on the subject of the transportation of the mail.

I hope this injustice will not be done. If they can wait for three months it must be because the service is not very important; and if it is not very important, it is not going to cost a great deal of money. But to a man who has gone out on the frontier, as all these people have, expecting that the Government will accommodate the service to his needs as well as those of his neighbors, this is a most injurious and unjust discrimination. There certainly can be no reason whatever for it.

We have been generous, and I think on the whole just in this bill as it now stands, to the service already established.

But I would call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this money that is provided for here was practically appropriated by the Post-Office Department months ago; and when they have appropriated this money, when they have enlarged the service on these long routes—and I am not complaining of that at all; I think on the whole it was done wisely, except in a comparative way—they then propose to cut down on the small routes in the different States. So for months there have been accumulating in the Post-Office Department petitions for the increase of service that is required for immigration that has gone into that country during the last five or six months, and during that period of time there has been no increase whatever. In the State which I have the honor in part to represent, the entire increase of the number of trips in the last twelve months has been only to the amount of about $11,000—no increase at all compared with the increase of population during that time; no increase at all compared with the actual increase of the income of the Post-Office Department within that time; none whatever as compared with the actual increase in the amount of mail matter which has been required to be sent.

It is just as important that these people should have their mails within the next three months as during any past three months, or any three months yet to come; and it would look like saving at the spigot and losing at the bung to come in here and make this large appropriation for these great routes, properly made, too, and yet to say that because we are making this liberal appropriation we will cut off these frontier people for the next three months, and so arrange that they shall not have any increase of service at all. It seems to me like trifling with these people, trifling with the interests of the service, in every way unworthy of Congress, to attach to the bill such an inhibition as that.

This service is essential to these people in more ways than one. It has become a part of the policy of this Government to do a large express business. On a recent trip to New York I was invited to go into a room where there was an agent who had been in business several years, and whose business was the placarding of merchandise to be sent by mail through the Western States and Territories. There were shawls, fancy articles, dry goods, everything going into the stock of a country dry goods merchant, for transportation to New Mexico, Arizona, and all over the western country. These people take advantage of that because the Government has invited them to do it. Anything weighing four pounds or under may be transported in that way. It has become a regular business. Men who go to that country go out with the knowledge of the fact that the Government is doing this business; they go out expecting to be supplied to a large extent by this method, and they have a right to expect that service. The Government has stepped in and usurped a business formerly carried on by private corporations and private persons, and the people have gone there with the expectation that they shall still be served in that way. If a part of the people can be served in that way, why not all of them?

More than that, the people who go out there go from the centers of civilization in the Eastern States, and they are not citizens of Kansas yet; they are constituents of other gentlemen on this floor. They are the men who go out from New England and the Middle States. They have been in the habit of having daily newspapers and weekly papers, and they want papers there as often as once a week. They do not want it postponed two weeks or a month by a dilatory process of carrying the mails. If they take a daily paper they want it carried every day. The mail they get is as of much importance to them now as in the locality where they formerly lived. It has been a part of the policy of this Government to carry that mail to them, and it ought to continue to do so. If it is to be a part of the policy of the Government to say that for the purpose of a little beggarly saving of ten or twenty thousand dollars for three months we will suspend this service, is there anything meaner or more contemptible than such economy as that after giving $1,100,000 by the bill to the great routes? Because we vote $1,100,000 in the bill it is proposed to strike down a whole service, and for three months save something, to have your poor people out on the frontier make up for what you have given liberally in the forepart of the bill.

Let us give the people of the United States the service they are entitled to all over and all alike, or else give them none. This is a discrimination, as it seems to me, aimed at what the Postmaster-General had in his mind when he said that if he was obliged to bring the service within the appropriation he would reduce it all over the country; but the committee go back of him and say "you shall not do that; you shall not reduce it in that section of the country where you have increased the service before." That affects practically only the western portion of the country; it affects the frontier; it affects Kansas, Texas, Nebraska, Idaho, Montana, Washington, Oregon, and California, and does not affect any community lying east of the Mississippi River. Twenty-five thousand dollars, perhaps $10,000—certainly $25,000 would be ample to cover the service for which I am pleading. For the lack of that these people must be without service three months. It is an affront to them; it is a break in the uniformity of the postal service of the United States; it is bringing down economy and applying restrictions to this Executive Department in the very smallest part of it.

Why did not the committee say that before this thing was done there should be some restrictions somewhere? Why did they wait until the last moment and provide in regard to all the service that has not been expedited, this trifling service, this small service that costs three, four, or five hundred dollars a year, that there shall be no increase there while the increase that has been made on all the routes which cost $150,000 or $200,000 a year shall go on just exactly as it has been according to the contracts made by the Postmaster-General?

I do not complain of the routes that have been increased and expedited. It is a necessity that should have been done. If I made any complaint it would be as to the manner in which the fund has been distributed; but the Postmaster-General went on, I suppose, without calculating the exact amount he was expending until the money was exhausted or liable to be so, and then he had to wait until Congress met, and when Congress met it dallied with the question for months, and meantime people were going without the service, and at the last moment we are to be told that there cannot be any increase on these routes, notwithstanding the lavishness with which we have appropriated money for the longer routes. I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. WALLACE. I trust the Senator from Kansas will be satisfied with the bill as it stands. It proceeds upon the assumption that the $1,100,000 is a large amount of money to vote to continue the service as it now exists. When $5,900,000 were all that was asked by the Department for the service of this year, the Senator from Kansas it seems to me ought to be content with what the committee recommend here.

Beside that, the second section of the bill provides for giving money for new service. There is $100,000 appropriated for new service. In every case in which a new route is opened, money is voted by this bill for that service. And the cases put by the Senator do not apply at all. It is only the case of a route in which there being perhaps a weekly mail the neighborhood wishes a semi-weekly mail or a tri-weekly mail, and that is denied by Congress until the end of this fiscal year. They have the mail on that route now. They can probably wait for three months.

Inasmuch as the new service that is needed in that country is provided for by the second section, it seems to me that the deprivation of increase of trips, indeed the prohibition of the expenditure of any more money than is necessary to conduct the service as it exists to-day to the end of the fiscal year, is very proper in view of the facts that have been elicited in this debate and that now exist. The exercise of such a discretion by that Department as has been shown, if it be passed over in silence, if voting the money that Congress proposes to vote by this bill, it ought to be accepted by those who have the results of that expedition and the large increase in expenditure that the Department made in the last year.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to say in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania that if the committee had been desirous solely of saving money, that is, money worth saving as such, it would have saved it by cutting off three months of the large surplus to which the $1,100,000 is appropriated. I do not say they ought to have done so, but I say that, after treating that service liberally and fairly, it was decidedly unjust and illiberal in the last degree to then sit down so thoroughly on the new communities where a small sum of money would go a great way. They have been lavish with great contractors, lavish with the long routes, and then their economy has come in at the last moment; and after expending, as they seem to insinuate, $1,100,000 extravagantly, they propose to save three, ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand dollars at the end. That is what I object to.

If there had been an intention to save money, if that had been the purpose, it should have been saved elsewhere. I object that this places an unjust discrimination in carrying on the mail service of the United States. I say there is no reason in the world why the people who are entitled to increased service during the next three months should not have it as well as the people who were entitled to it six months ago. If the argument is that they can wait three months, how does the Senator from Pennsylvania know that they cannot wait twelve months, or until the end of time? It has been the policy of the Government always to give the people wherever they went mail facilities, not next month or next year, but all the time, every day. Wherever a man has gone on the frontier, into the mountains or anywhere else, the very moment he is there located and has made his wants known, it has been the policy of the Government to extend the mail service in order to reach him, and not merely to extend it to reach him, but to anticipate him, in order that by that anticipation there should be greater inducement to other people to go there as well. It is a part of the settled policy of the Government, and this seems like making an unworthy exception to that liberal, just, enlightened policy which has done so much to build up the western portion of the continent.

Besides, it accomplishes nothing. If the Senate wants to say that this branch of service shall not exceed $25,000 or $50,000, I do not object to that. But there are to-day hundreds of applications from my own State and from Nebraska, as I happen to know, because the service of the two States is connected, on file in the Post-Office Department for increase of service on small routes from weekly to semi-weekly. All the service granted during the calendar year 1879 in my State was only $11,000, and that $11,000 was well spent, and results in giving a large increase of service to the people of that State. I have no doubt $10,000 more would do it. But I am not speaking for Kansas alone; I am speaking for the entire frontier. If after appropriating $1,100,000 you stick at $25,000 or even at $50,000 for the purpose of giving increased service to the people who are on the ground who have gone there on the supposition that they would be met there by mail facilities, facilities to be increased from time to time as circumstances should warrant, then, as I say, we have made a discrimination against the very class of people who most ought to meet with favor here.

Mr. BLAINE. I think there is a good deal in what the honorable Senator from Kansas states.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The question being put, the amendment was declared to be rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not think that the question was understood.

Mr. WALLACE. I understood a motion was made to strike out, and that was the question that was put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair perhaps was at fault in not stating distinctly what the amendment was; but the question was on the adoption of the amendment in line 21 of the first section, recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. So I thought.

Mr. WALLACE. How did the Chair decide the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided that the amendment failed. It is perfectly competent for the Senator to call for a second vote.

Mr. TELLER. Let it go.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the Chair decide that the committee's amendment has failed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so held.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I move to reconsider the vote. It was not understood.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair can put the question again if there was any misunderstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Chair will put the question again. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is in line 21 of section 1; after the word "service" insert "or increase of trips."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations to insert these words.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 30, noes 23.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not think the suggestions that were made by the honorable Senator from Kansas have been quite met by the committee of which I am a member. I am very frank to say that. Take the Senator's own State and States that lie alongside and further on, the very season of the year to which this inhibition is to apply is the very season of the year at which immigration is the largest and settlement the most rapid. You propose to say that a rule hitherto existing in the Post-Office Department without question, and hitherto exercised according to discretion, shall over the whole of that vast region be suspended; and that where a route exists on which there has been a very sparse population last year, and now by the influx of immigration there is a very large population, and there has been only a weekly trip heretofore, and in the judgment of the Postmaster-General and in the judgment of every impartial man those settlers are entitled to a semi-weekly, or tri-weekly, or, it may be, a daily mail for three months of the year of grace 1880, that function of the Post-Office Department shall remain suspended. It has been exercised from the inauguration of George Washington to this moment; it will be exercised after the 30th of June; and we sit here, and, for some reason not known to law nor to logic, so far as I have heard it, we say—

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me to remind him that the inhibition is not only for three months, but it is for six months, because during the past three months, on account of the want of money, and on account of these existing complications, it has been an utter impossibility to secure any increase of service.

Mr. BLAINE. They cannot go back and do the service for a time that is past; therefore it is for the time that is ahead.

Mr. PADDOCK. But the applications are on file.

Mr. BLAINE. The principle which the Senator suggests of course is correct. I do not see, Mr. President, the logic of this amendment, I am free to say, although I am a member of the committee and consented to its insertion, not specially noticing or knowing a great deal about it until the Senator from Kansas presented the case. I do not see why for three months of this year a power should remain dormant in the hands of the Post-Office Department to be invoked again at the beginning of the next fiscal year, and hitherto always exercised without question. I think I shall have to unite with the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Just a word, for I do not wish to consume time. If this amendment of the committee is lost then we must increase the amount of money that has been appropriated, for we propose to appropriate just the amount of money that it takes to carry out the service for the present year with the present mail facilities as they now stand. On the basis they now stand we have appropriated, according to the Sixth Auditor's report, the amount of money necessary.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I submit to my honorable friend the chairman of the committee of which I am a member, whether on the whole our committee can afford or the Senate can afford to stand upon the principle that there shall be a suspended function for three months of the year because of some little difference we have got into as to the transcending of appropriations or some little conflict of authority with the Post-Office Department which we propose here in a preamble to censure—whether on that account or for any other reason we shall be justified by our constituents and by ourselves in saying to the people in the remotest Territory of this country (not to speak of many States that rely so largely on the star service) "You must not expect until the three months have elapsed that the ordinary functions of the Post-Office Department shall work for your relief, for we have ordered through Congress that animation in that Department shall be suspended for ninety days." I do not believe that proposition can be maintained.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Just one word. It will be noticed that this is for increased trips. The same mail facilities which now exist in the Western States will continue, and the committee, as the Senator from Maine well knows, have reported $100,000 for new service, so that, if there are any new routes, or if persons have gone to new neighborhoods and require new routes, there is a provision here of $100,000 given for that purpose. It appears to me, in the face of what has occurred during the past year, we are appropriating $1,100,000 now for the increased service and expedited trips, we ought to stop it. There must be a stop somewhere.

Mr. BLAINE. If there was a new express train put over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, on which my honorable friend lives, everybody along that route would be clamoring to have a new mail by that train. I live in a remote New England town. We have four mails a day coming into my town by rail, and if there was a fifth train we would struggle hard to have one on that. Now we are proposing to apply to what is known as the star service that which the communities that reside on the railway service would not be expected to submit to. My colleague on the committee [Mr. EATON] shakes his head.

Mr. EATON. We have to submit to it.

Mr. BLAINE. I submit to the honorable Senator that just in proportion to the extension of the railway service in this country, and in proportion to the number of trains largely, the mail service has increased. Where you had one mail a day, you get two a day, or three a day where there is an extra train; and I do not know how many more the large cities that are specially favored receive. This is an inhibition that does not apply at all to any other service.

Mr. EATON. If my friend will permit me, it is the large cities, not the small ones, as he and I understand perfectly well. Take the road from New York to Boston, if you please, where there are half a dozen trains a day. There are applications made every day from such towns as Wallingford and Meriden, where my colleague resides, and so on, that all trains should stop there; but they do not. They say, "No; such and such a train after leaving New York shall only stop at Stamford, at Bridgeport, at New Haven and Hartford and Springfield." Therefore all the towns, and large towns, too, are not provided for.

Mr. BLAINE. My friend is mixing up passenger traffic with mail transportation. The great express train about which he speaks is, in my judgment, not a mail train at all. The struggle there is for passenger accommodations, quite another thing.

Mr. EATON. So they are all mixed up here. Passengers and mails are mixed up on the star routes.

Mr. BLAINE. The proposition of the Senator from Kansas refers especially to mail service. Now my honorable friend, referring to that train on which he and I travel a good many times a year, knows that in order to make that train as expeditious as it is between the two terminal points it cannot be a way train.

Mr. EATON. It is a mail train.

Mr. BLAINE. No, it is not a mail train; the mail train starts two hours ahead of it; and yet so persistent have been the constituents of my honorable friend from Connecticut that they have absolutely delayed that train for from forty-five minutes to an hour, and delayed all the eastern travel in order that sundry and divers Connecticut stations might be included in it.

Mr. EATON. My honorable friend from Maine is mistaken now, as he has been a great many other times. It is not delayed, for it is not stopped within the limits of my State but three times.

Mr. BLAINE. Stamford, Norwalk, Bridgeport, New Haven, Meriden, Hartford, and once beyond. I go over it every year a dozen times, more or less, sometimes more and sometimes less.

But that is not the point at all. That is a mere question of passenger traffic and people who want to get on that fast train. This relates to the rights of the frontiersmen to have a tri-weekly or semi-weekly mail as much in the spring of 1880 as in the spring of any other year, past or future, if the demand is the same. That is what I understand the proposition of the honorable Senator from Kansas to be.

Mr. EATON. I have no doubt it is the opinion of my honorable friend from Maine that it is very important that they should have it during the coming three months. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if this amendment of the committee is not agreed to, then the Senate ought to strike out the clause of the House bill altogether, as it appears to me. The clause is—

During the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service on any postal star route shall be made.

The committee propose to add after "expediting service" the words "or increase of trips." It is not clear to my mind that those two subdivisions of service are of exactly the same class, and therefore the amendment of the committee is merely to make perfect the provision of the bill. If there is any force in what the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Maine have said, as of course there always must be as they say it, it applies just as strongly to expediting the service as it does to the increase of trips.

This bill, Mr. President, is a deficiency bill. A very extraordinary state of circumstances now exists. It appears that, in spite of the appropriation of Congress upon the recommendations of the Department a year ago, there is now a very large and unprecedented deficiency in this service, owing to the extension of the service and the making of contracts which the law and the appropriation had not provided for. Now, we are called upon to furnish money enough to carry on what the Department has begun, to the end of the year. That is the object of the bill. In order to guard against a further supposed misappropriation of money—I do not express my opinion upon it now, whether it is so or not—

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And a further deficiency.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And a further deficiency—as a consequence, the House inserted the provision that there should be no further expediting of service, which is the increase of the rapidity of a given number of trips, and the Committee on Appropriations has added to that "or increase of trips," so that if the House proposition be agreed to it cannot be "walked around," as the phrase is, by the Post-Office Department, where there is now a semi-weekly mail by getting around the provision that that should not be made more rapid by putting on a tri-weekly mail. The answer to it by the Senator from Kansas is that the western frontier—which is a very patriotic and very indefinite phrase—is filling up, and is going to fill up very fast this spring as soon as the snow melts off and the roads get good—

Mr. TELLER. It is filling up now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Filling now, and consequently that the United States cannot wait until the 1st of July in providing for this alarming deficiency to see what further provision ought to be made in respect of increasing the trips on already established routes.

Another provision in the bill is adequate to any new settlement where a new service is to be instituted, and provision is made for it; but where there is an existing community with an existing service the House undertook to say, imperfectly, that owing to this alarming state of things in respect to the spending of money we should pull up until the 1st of July. The Committee on Appropriations have said, to make that perfect, we must also declare that you shall not only not expedite the service but you shall not make any increase of trips on the existing routes until the 1st of July. It does not appear to me that that is so very bad a thing.

The Senator from Maine says that there are four mails a day at Augusta; I believe that is where my friend lives. The city of Washington, according to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief, where I get my mail, has only three mails a day. That is all we Senators get, if other Senators are treated as I am. Yet we get on very well.

Mr. TELLER. Three mails from where?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Three mails from anywhere that are delivered to me. I do not know how many come in from various parts of the country.

Mr. TELLER. More than that come in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are not more than three mails between the city of New York and Washington delivered during a day.

Mr. TELLER. The mail from New York is not the only mail that comes in; some other mails come from the West and from the South, but the people in these little towns get only one mail from any portion of the world.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there any one direction from which mails come more than three times a day?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The inquiry of my friend from New York sotto voce, is the very one I was going to put. There is no one route, I think I am safe in saying, that comes into the capital of this nation, that has more than three mails a day from any one direction. And speaking for one, trying to do my small share in the transaction of public business and to answer correspondence promptly, I think it would be just as well for the public interest if there were not more than two mails that came into the city of Washington over any one route, in a day; and if three mails requiring the running of three trains cost more than two, I should be willing, according to my present knowledge, subject to a change of course, to vote to reduce the number to two in this very city if the expense of three is greater than it is of two.

Mr. BLAINE. You would save more by reducing the number to one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And we could save still more by reducing it down to nothing. We may say on the same principle that the Senator from Maine by his private remark to me seems to imply, that because it is useful and wholesome for a man to eat four slices of bread in a day, it ought to be useful and wholesome for him to eat a barrel of flour. It may be so in Maine, but it is not so in Vermont. [Laughter.] A reasonable and proper limit for all things, moderation and temperance and economy, is the true thing to look at. That being the state of the case, it appears to me that the committee is perfectly right in perfecting this bill in providing that for the time being and in making up this deficiency and providing in another section for new routes, for new settlements of people, we will keep the service where it is until the 1st of July.

Mr. BECK. I know how useless it is to fight against the power and patronage of the Post-Office Department. That is demonstrated now; and the meaning of this increase of trips for the next three months means for four years, or as long as the present contracts run on all the routes where the increase is given, unless it be that the Department concludes to pay a month's extra pay for nothing, to stop service.

Mr. BLAINE. May I ask the honorable Senator if the suppression of them for the next three months means their suppression for four years?

Mr. BECK. No; but it means that whenever a new increase is granted it remains for the residue of the contract term, unless a month's extra pay is given to the contractor for nothing when the service is taken off. Is not that true? Since we are granting now $1,100,000 to supply a deficiency which never ought to have existed, because we are willing to stand by what has been done, pending an investigation in the House relative to the merits of that, it surely is a very small matter when we have given $100,000 for new routes, to say that you shall stop, pending that investigation, increasing those routes at any rate you please, and the expedition at any rate you please, until the 1st day of July, while we have this investigation going on.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senator from Kentucky will observe that whereas the investigation relates to a number of routes that you can count on your fingers, the inhibition covers 10,700 routes, and you are going to make 10,700 routes stand still under this inhibition while the House of Representatives is finding out whether there has not been some abuse on some large star routes, not as numerous as the fingers I am using. That does not seem to be exactly logical.

And while I am up, allow me another word. If the Senator from Vermont does not see the distinction, he is the only Senator who does not, between inhibiting the expediting of an existing route and the holding down of a weekly mail where the increase and inflow of population demands a tri-weekly or daily mail. If the increase of trips upon an existing route is not a very different principle from the giving of a large sum of money to carrying an existing mail a great deal more rapidly, I have only to say that the Senator from Vermont is the only one who does not observe it.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, it seems so impossible to close this bill to-night that I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 16, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

KANSAS CITY, FORT SCOTT AND GULF RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I move, Mr. Speaker, that joint resolution (H. R. No. 240) for the relief of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, which was introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] and referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, be withdrawn from that committee and referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I have no objection whatever to that change of reference.

There being no objection, the Committee on Railways and Canals was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and it was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT QUINCY, ILLINOIS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5074) to provide for the erection of a public post-office building in the city of Quincy, Illinois, and for other purposes, for the purpose of putting it upon its passage at this time. It is purely a local matter, and has been here for over a year. It is important I should get the action of the House at as early a day as practicable; and I hope my request will not be denied as I have heretofore given the House but little trouble in this way.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman propose to do with the bill?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask by unanimous consent to bring it before the House in order to put it upon its passage at this time. It does not appropriate any money whatever.

Mr. BLOUNT. There are a great many bills of this sort, and I must object.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. It does not make any appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

SATURDAY FOR DEBATE.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move, Mr. Speaker, that by unanimous consent the session for Saturday next be set apart for discussion of the refunding bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; no other business whatever to be transacted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BREWER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SAWYER. I rise to a privileged question. Notice was given on Thursday last that the contested-election case of Bradley vs. Slemmons would be called up for consideration to-day. I move now to proceed to the consideration of that election case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the election case of Bradley vs. Slemmons.

Mr. McMAHON. I propose to raise the question of consideration of this bill for the purpose of proceeding with the deficiency bill, and at the proper time will move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio raises the question of consideration of the election case named with a view to proceeding with the general deficiency bill, and it is for the House to determine the question.

Mr. WEAVER. Is that question debatable?

The SPEAKER. Priority of business is not debatable.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not know what the question is—

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. If the Speaker will bear with me for a moment I will state the point of order. I rose to ask the question whether or not the report of the Committee on Elections should not, under the rules, be first considered by the House, and in preference to any other business, that being a matter of the very highest privilege that the House can consider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri to move to go into the consideration of that question, and the gentleman from Ohio raised the question of consideration, and it is for the House to determine.

Mr. HOOKER. The rule does not prescribe—

The SPEAKER. The rule prescribes and the practice of the House also prescribes that the gentleman from Ohio has the right to raise the question of consideration.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. SAWYER.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 108.

So the House refused to consider the election case of Bradley against Slemmons.

Mr. McMAHON. I now move to dispense with the morning hour and proceed with the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. This would require a two-thirds vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 124, noes 28.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the House determined to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. McMAHON. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the general deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the general deficiency bill. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the House has decided to take up this bill. It contains some twenty-seven items supplying deficiencies in the service, and they are all, in the judgment of the Appropriations Committee, in which I as a member most heartily concur, immediately indispensable to the service. To pass the bill is a work of necessity, I might say of mercy; that is to say, I speak of the bill as reported from the committee.

I was a little surprised, to some extent grieved, to have notice given that there are two amendments proposed. One is a somewhat extensive bill, certainly an important amendment, changing the manner of choosing the Congressional Printer. Another amendment proposes to incorporate in this deficiency bill an appropriation for the payment of United States marshals. The first changes existing law, and is also the substance of another bill pending before the House, and ought to be out of order on an appropriation bill. The second is also the substance of a pending bill, and virtually changes, certainly defeats, existing law. Points of order have been reserved, and personally I hope they will be ruled out. But if they should not be, I hope the House will refuse to incorporate them. I for one shall be glad to vote for the bill as it stands. I reserve the right to vote against it if we are to have political legislation incorporated in it.

The proposed section for the payment of marshals is to pay the marshals and their general deputies. We have a bill pending before the House, reported, I believe, from the committee, proposing to devote $600,000 to the marshals and their general deputies, and containing a proviso forbidding the use of any of this money for the payment of expenses under the national election laws. I understand it is proposed to drop the latter clause; but nevertheless by retaining the term "general" the same effect is reached. None of the money can be appropriated for the payment of expenses incurred under the general election laws save as marshals or general deputies may have been engaged, and most of the marshals so employed are special marshals. Therefore dropping the prohibitory proviso is nearly immaterial so far as the practical effect is concerned.

It appears, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that at the very first opportunity the democratic majority of this House renews the tactics that compelled the long, excited, and expensive extra session of last summer. And it does not appear thus far that the democratic party has learned anything from the debates of that session or from the public opinion of the country. The leaders seem determined to prove all that was charged against the party.

Now, sir, against this policy of what I shall term thumb-screw legislation I now, as I heretofore have done, enter my vehement and indignant protest. It is not the treatment that we have the right to expect from our associates in the great work of legislation.

The character of attempts of this kind has been very fully discussed and explained and appropriately designated before. It is practically revolutionary. I am astonished to see those gentlemen especially who are always protesting that they are misunderstood by the House and the country supporting tactics of this description. During the debate on the rules and at other times we have heard from members of the majority, a large number of them, protests that they were opposed to political legislation on appropriation bills. They have agreed in substance with us of the minority in disapproving that policy. Yet we see no indication in their actual votes that they are not to continue it. They avow it; they take the responsibility of it.

It has been claimed here in the House that the radical and revolutionary faction of the democracy has lost its control over the party. I perceive no evidence of it. There was nothing in what was done last summer that is anything more radical or revolutionary than what gentlemen propose here.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will, once. If I have made any mistake of fact, I am willing to be corrected.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to ask the gentleman if he is aware of the fact that the proposed amendment coming from the Printing Committee is in terms, or in substance at least, exactly a bill that was passed while the republican party had the control of both branches of Congress?

Mr. HAWLEY. That was not the point I made. I believe it, however, to be in terms a bill already pending and therefore subject to the point of order that it cannot be brought in as an amendment. But the true point is this. Here is a political matter sought to be incorporated with an appropriation bill so that in dealing with it we are compelled to vote for or against appropriations according to our judgment for or against the political measure.

Mr. WILSON. Is it not the fact that the rule now is substantially as it was then, and that the amendment offered here now is in substance identical with the bill pending on the Calendar?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is a point which can be better argued when the point of order is made on the amendment. If the gentleman is correct, the amendment he speaks of should be ruled out.

THUMB-SCREW LEGISLATION.

I propose very briefly to review this practice of tacking or of attaching political legislation to appropriation bills. The attempt was made to justify this by reference to the history of Great Britain. There can be found precedents in that history previous to 1688, when Great Britain was engaged in a great political revolution. Since 1688 it has not been British practice. And since 1710 there has been an absolute rule of the House of Lords prohibiting it. It is regarded there as revolutionary and destructive of the rights of the House of Lords, barring that House from a free expression of its opinion upon bills of supply.

It is sought to justify it by reference to precedents in the legislation of Congress while it was under republican control. That cannot be done, in my opinion; because while the republicans, when they had a majority of both Houses, and the President, also, on their side, were in the very bad habit at times of putting general legislation on appropriation bills, it had not the effect then of thumb-screwing the Executive. And when some of the most illustrious examples of this bad habit occurred they had a two-thirds vote in both Houses, and it was therefore, as far as compelling the Executive was concerned, a mere matter of form; they could pass the bill, whether he approved or disapproved.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to ask the gentleman—

Mr. HAWLEY. Better not. I wish to proceed now without interruption.

The practice, however, is not justifiable because republicans were at times guilty of it. The only example furnished by republicans which is in reality applicable to the present discussion is that occurring during the great Kansas agitation, when they proposed to forbid the use of the Army in Kansas to enforce certain wicked legislation. In that instance the republicans, having brought about an extra session and come to a serious consideration of the subject, abandoned the attempt, being satisfied that they were wrong in proposing to coerce the Government in that way; and among the protests against tacking, against thumb-screwing legislation, there are none more logical and impressive than those made by eminent democratic Senators.

The judgment of the country is against this. The history of constitutional legislation is against it. Some of the States of the Union condemned it as early as 1776. In their first constitutions they emphatically condemned it and for the very reasons that we are in the habit of assigning on this side. As time passed, constitution after constitution has been so altered as to prevent it. Twenty-eight of the State constitutions rendered it impossible by a variety of provisions, but a great many of them containing this simple rule: "Bills shall contain but one subject which shall be distinctly described in the title." Other constitutions permit the executive to veto some while approving other sections of appropriation bills. And when the confederates came to adopt a constitution they took the existing Constitution of the United States with certain modifications. Among the modifications which their veteran politicians and legislators thought it necessary to make are clauses that rendered it utterly impossible to do what the democratic party of this House is seeking to do here to-day. We have the history of the State constitutions, the general progress of constitutional legislation in the country, the judgment of the Houses of Congress before this agitation in repeated instances, and what I am sure will weigh strongly with some gentlemen and which weighs somewhat with all, the thoughtful action of the confederate convention considering the defects of the Federal Constitution.

Under this policy of the democratic party there can be nothing like deliberate legislation. The work becomes a farce; we are not free to vote as we please; bills become a patchwork of general and political legislation and appropriations; the freedom of voting becomes the freedom of one subject to the highway robber, subject to the black-mailer, subject to the torture of inquisition. The call of the roll in a sense brings with it an insult, because it asks me to vote upon brass and clay, and silver and gold all mingled in one image. No legislative body has a right to bring a member to that emergency.

Now, as to the provision concerning the marshals, of which I hope I shall speak still more briefly. The Committee on Appropriations decided to make it an independent bill, which was rightly done. It is now proposed to put it on this appropriation bill, which is wrongly done. There is due marshals and special deputies in California some $7,500 for labor under the election laws. The supervisors of elections are paid out of the Treasury under a permanent statute. This is not a matter of discretion with us, whether or not we will incur indebtedness of this sort. While the statute stands any two reputable citizens applying to the marshal have the right to demand that special deputies be appointed, and the marshal is imperatively directed by law to appoint those special deputies, whose very wise and proper duties are very carefully pointed out in the statute, and whose compensation is fixed. The indebtedness, therefore, may be incurred at any time by the marshal and two reputable citizens, without waiting for a specific appropriation. To refuse to pay it is to refuse to pay a lawful debt of the United States, and that is what is proposed in this instance.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] of the Committee on Appropriations, says that the majority of this House will appropriate nothing for special deputies, supervisors, or anything of that sort, and will not do so while the election law exists. I call upon this House and upon the country to properly stigmatize the character of that declaration. If the majority had in the first place brought before us a bill repealing or modifying the election laws I could listen with more charity. I hold it to be their first duty, before adopting this policy, even if they are ever justifiable in doing so, to show us how far they desire to modify the election laws, or whether they desire to entirely repeal them. They have not done that. In fact, by leaving in some of the appropriation bills provisions relating to supervisors, last summer, they admitted the propriety of the law, or at least they declined to put themselves in square opposition to it by supporting a bill repealing it.

It appears, then, that they declare positively that they will not afford the necessary means for executing laws which they do not like. Now General Grant's doctrine is very much better; that the best way to bring about the repeal of an obnoxious law is to enforce it. I do not say that in some great revolutionary crisis Congress might not declare that it would not appropriate money to carry out existing law. But if it be the deliberate judgment of the democracy that the laws protecting elections are of the description that justify revolutionary measures, I shall be glad to have the declaration frankly made, so that the country may understand it.

THE NATIONAL RIGHT TO PROTECT NATIONAL ELECTIONS.

The Constitution of the United States provides very clearly that—The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.—Article 1, section 4.

Now the construction of that section of the Constitution was very well understood in the constitutional convention. It was very thoroughly debated and defended by Mr. Madison and other eminent gentlemen, on the exact ground that it is indispensable to the Government of the United States that it should have the power to protect the people in electing members of that Government.

It has been claimed that this power is to be exercised by Congress only in cases where the States have failed or neglected to provide for proper congressional elections. That point was made also in the constitutional convention, and it was there overruled. When the State conventions came to consider the new Constitution they were to some extent dissatisfied with this provision; and in six of those conventions the point was again raised, and an amendment to the Constitution was proposed, providing that Congress should not legislate on this subject of elections except in cases where the States had failed to legislate.

These proposed amendments came before the first Congress of the United States under the Constitution. They were deliberately debated in that Congress; Mr. Madison renewed his own arguments made in the constitutional convention. A proposition to submit to the State Legislatures an amendment giving to article 1, section 4, the construction described was voted down by 23 yeas to 23 nays; and the attempt has never been renewed.

The constitutional convention, the State conventions, and the first Congress under the Constitution understood that subject precisely as the republican party to-day understands it. Since that time the legislation of Congress has been in accordance therewith. Some of the States were in the habit of electing their congressional delegates in gross—by general ticket. Congress provided that Representatives should be elected by single districts. The States were in the habit of electing Representatives at different times; Congress provided that Representatives should all be elected on the Tuesday after the first Monday of November. The States were in the habit of electing their Senators at different times and in various ways, and with such irregularities that the people sometimes remained unrepresented in the Senate for long periods, and serious dissensions arose.

The Congress of the United States provided in minute detail for the election of Senators of the United States, going into the State Legislatures and prescribing the duties of clerks and presiding officers and members, commanding them to assemble at a certain hour in the day—twelve o'clock—and vote viva voce for a Senator; to assemble in joint convention the next day at twelve o'clock and read the distinct record of the ballot in each house; directing them, in case the record showed disagreement, to vote jointly and viva voce, and directing that in case they made no choice they should meet in joint convention day after day at twelve o'clock till they had made a choice. It is impossible, therefore, that Congress could have shown any more clearly its understanding of that section and of the right and duty of Congress to supremely regulate the election of Congressmen. And what it can "regulate" it can protect.

The democracy now say that an election law passed by Congress in direct, clear, incontrovertible execution of that section shall not be carried out, and they propose to put what is equivalent to that into this little deficiency bill—a work of necessity and mercy, as I have called it. I am obliged to say that this is a part of the general hostility manifested by a large body of people in this country to Federal power—just and constitutional Federal power of every description—hostility to the Army, hostility to the Executive, hostility to the Supreme Court, hostility to the protection of Federal officers by Federal courts while they are executing Federal laws, hostility to any attempt on the part of the General Government to protect the rights of the people in the sacred duty of voting.

I pass on to discuss

and what has been said concerning the Public Printer, apropos to the amendment which has been submitted to us providing for a new method of electing that officer, and also appropriately under the item of the bill appropriating $400,000 to carry on the work of that office.

Up to 1860 the Government was very much annoyed in endeavoring to get its printing done. Every system that has lately been spoken of in debate, nearly every system imaginable, had been tried; and of all the greatest failures was the attempt to do the work by contract. This is shown in the debates of 1852 and 1860 in speeches of members of both parties, whig and democratic.

In 1852 the attempt was made to escape these difficulties by appointing a superintendent of public printing who should supervise the work; and under his supervision the evils were not quite as great. In 1860 it was decided to have a Government Printer, and a Government Printing Office as well as a Government Printer. Since that time there have been comparatively few difficulties. I might say there were next to none until the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was taken away from private parties, and put into the Government Printing Office. From that time there has been a constant war upon the Public Printer and upon the establishment—promoted I am bound to say from what I see in the public prints and hear everywhere—promoted largely by disappointed and discharged persons and by persons anxious to get the place of the Public Printer, which they fancy is one of great emolument, though the salary is only $4,000 and the position one of the most laborious and vexatious under the Government. In addition to this, the opportunities of that department for what people call political plunder or patronage are greatly exaggerated; for there are but from one thousand to fifteen hundred men, women, boys, and girls employed there.

I incorporate in my speech a brief description of the work done by the Government Printer, taken from the minority report in the Hatcher and Finley investigation:

The amount is large, and the question naturally arises, for what is this expenditure made? The items for which expenditure is made consist of salaries paid the Public Printer and his assistants; wages of employés; expenses of the office of the Public Printer; the public printing; paper for the public printing; lithographing and engraving; public binding; CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, miscellaneous reports, and blank-books. A more detailed statement shows that the Government Printing Office does the work for the Department of State, including books of instruction, blank-books, and blanks for consuls throughout the world; books, blanks, and blank-books for the Treasury Department, including the custom-houses, mints, sub-treasuries, and internal-revenue offices for all parts of the United States; for the Post-Office Department, including all the post-offices, numbering over thirty-nine thousand, and the money-order offices of the country; for the War Department, including the books and blanks for the Army of the United States, arsenals, depot quartermasters, the Signal-Office, Surgeon-General's Office, &c.; for the Department of the Interior, which includes the land offices in all parts of the country, the large bureaus of the Patent and Pension Offices, and the offices of pension agents; for the Navy Department, including the Navy, the navy-yards, the Marine Corps, Naval Observatory, Nautical Almanac Office, and Hydrographic Office; for the Department of Justice, the Supreme Court of the United States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia; the Department of Agriculture; the Library of Congress; both Houses of Congress; and the Court of Claims.

Naturally enough the quantity of this work has grown from year to year, for the Government and the business of the country grow. During the year ending June 30, 1879, there were 110,749 pages of type set up; the number of distinct copies of books, reports, documents, bills, resolutions, &c., printed by order of and for Congress was 15,248,112; the cost of the paper was $154,205.45; the cost of binding was $133,298.95; the total cost, $556,114.23. And this was what may be called congressional printing, and does not include the printing of the Departments, the extraordinary amounts of which I shall show.

On the 11th of January, 1878, the House ordered a general investigation of all the departments, including especially the Government Printing Office. Mr. HATCH was chairman of the committee, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] was chairman of the sub-committee. With him were associated the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING,] a democrat, and Mr. Burdick, of Iowa, a republican. They conducted that investigation steadily during the long session and during the winter of 1878-79. The last hearing—at least the last reported stenographically—was on the 27th of January, 1879. The investigation was conducted with closed doors—a somewhat unusual course I suggest.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to say to the gentleman that his statement is not correct. That investigation was not conducted with closed doors. The doors were open; it was a public examination.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am very glad to hear that statement. I was assured by one of the parties that the examination was conducted with closed doors. I am glad it was not. There is one error corrected; I have enough faults left to comment upon. The committee had power to send for persons and papers. The sub-committee sat in the Government building much of the time during the spring of 1878, having full access to and full power over everything. The expert employed, Mr. Carlisle, had a room in the Government Printing Office devoted to himself. In short, nothing could be done more thoroughly, to all appearance, than was the work of these gentlemen, with a slight exception or two.

Let me incorporate an extract from the testimony of the expert, taken from Report No. 119, Forty-fifth Congress, third session—

By Mr. BURDICK:

Question. What experience if any, have you had in the keeping of accounts?
Answer. I have examined the accounts of the Treasury Department, the Post-Office Department, and the accounts of the Public Printer at different times.
Q. Do you consider yourself an expert?

A. I do consider myself an expert.

Q. Did you suggest this method of making up and preparing these statements which you have presented?

A. I do not think I did. My recollection is that I made up these statements by or under the direction of the committee.

Q. As an expert, would you say this was the proper way to make up an exhibit showing the receipts of the Public Printer and the disbursements made by him?

A. I think not, sir; no, sir; not to arrive at the exact condition.

Q. Might not a statement made in this manner show an untrue or deceptive result?

A. That might be the result from the manner in which the reports of the Printer are made up usually.

Q. If these statements are wrong and incorrect, it is in consequence of the method they are prepared, is it not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And not in the work itself?

A. No, sir; the difference is in the attempt to itemize the disbursements. The difference may have been made when they made up their annual report.

And, moreover, this expert testifies, as appears on page 611 of that testimony, that he had spent a very considerable time in connection with this business. He was repeatedly asked his opinion as to whether the business was conducted crookedly, or whether he discovered any crookedness whatever, and he disclaimed anything of the kind over and over again; that he had discovered nothing to justify suspicion even. I quote from page 611 of the report:

By Mr. KEIGHTLEY, (January 24, 1879):

Question. You have spent considerable time in the examination of the accounts in connection with the business done there?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have.

Q. From your examination of the accounts, I want to ask you what is your opinion as to whether the business is conducted crookedly or otherwise?

A. I am not prepared to answer that question fully. As far as I have gone, I have discovered nothing to lead me to suppose there has been any crookedness.

Q. Why can you not answer?

A. I have not completed my examination.

Q. You have spent much time in the examination of the papers, you regard yourself as an expert, and so far as you have gone you have discovered nothing to lead you to suppose that the Government Printing Office was conducted in any other way than honestly?

A. No, sir; because I have only gone so far.

By Mr. FINLEY:

Q. In what kind of shape did you find the books kept, good or otherwise?

A. Not in accordance with any idea of the manner in which books should be kept—as to the system. That is my opinion.

By Mr. BURDICK:

Q. What would be the true and correct method of ascertaining whether there is a deficiency in the accounts of the Public Printer or not?

A. By a comparison of the books of the Public Printer as to receipts and disbursements made by him with his accounts with the Treasury.

And again, on page 612 of that report, Mr. Burdick examines and the expert answers:

Question. Are accounts kept at the Treasury Department with the Public Printer?

Answer. They are.

Q. Have you consulted those accounts?

A. I have not; no, sir; except the account which has been before your committee.

I have compared that with the books of the Public Printer.

Q. If you had, acting on your own motion, desired to ascertain the true condition of the accounts of the Public Printer, would you not have examined the accounts kept with him at the Treasury?

A. I would, sir.

Q. Would you, as an expert, be satisfied with the result attained without an examination of his accounts there?

A. No, sir; I would not.

Q. Why have you not examined the accounts there?

A. I have had no opportunity.

Q. Have you been acting, in making out these statements, as your best judgment dictated?

A. No, sir; not as my best judgment dictated.

His statement at one time showed a deficiency of $119,000. That was all brought forward by the sub-committee, as I have been told by persons who were present, to the committee of investigation, and it was shown that the errors arose from an expenditure of something like $107,000 in printing agricultural reports. In short, the deficiency vanished under anything like a fair examination.

This expert was asked whether he was ever sent to the Treasury Department to examine the account kept with the Public Printer, and he said that he was not. He said it was impossible to make a fair and full examination unless that was done.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Connecticut will allow me to say I do not wish to take up his time, but simply desire to say to him that Mr. Carlisle, the expert, testified before the committee that all he undertook to do was to make a comparison between the reports of the Public Printer to Congress and his books, and that on such comparison he found the Public Printer had received, as appeared from his books, $119,000 more than he reported to Congress he had received. He did not undertake to say it was a deficiency; he only said that he found this difference between his reports and his books.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have listened attentively and carefully to what the gentleman has said, and I read from the testimony, report, page 608. (Mr. Burdick asked the expert concerning the sum of $107,986.35, disbursed for the Agricultural Report in 1877-78:)

Question. But this amount is reported as a deficiency in this statement prepared by you?

That is, Mr. Carlisle.

Answer. Yes, sir; that makes up one of the items.

In pages 600 to 604, the expert speaks of a "deficit" and a "deficiency," but he does say it cannot be fairly stated without examination of the books of the Treasury Department, which he was never asked or directed to examine.

Now, the committee at large overruled, as I understand, that special sub-committee and refused to report to Congress there had been a deficiency or that there was anything like a defalcation or fraud in the Department. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] to say the other day to the House that there was a deficiency of $119,000. Yet, sir, there is none such; every single dollar to which the Public Printer is entitled is recorded in the books of the Register of the Treasury, and every single dollar he has drawn is accounted for and a voucher for every dollar, placed there.

Now, when that full committee, in which the gentleman from Ohio was chairman of the sub-committee, came to make its final report, this is the sum and substance of the judgment which it found. It had spent one year diligently endeavoring to find fraud, corruption, wrong-doing, waste, extravagance; it was a good service—it was right to look for it, but when they had spent this long time on this service they summed up as follows:

The testimony submitted by your committee shows, it is believed, abuses of authority, usurpation, unjustifiable practices, and dereliction of duty, and that the affairs of the Government Printing Office should in many respects be thoroughly reformed. To the determination thus reached there follows the corollary that a law should be passed which will close the many avenues to corruption, extravagance, and malfeasance now invitingly open to most officers of that vast establishment.

This is very indefinite and, as political judgments go, a very harmless one; for the specifications of abuses of authority amount to nothing or are exceedingly trifling. No count of indictment is framed upon them. The avenues to "corruption" and "malfeasance" are declared to be open, but it is not said that any one entered. All the usurpation amounts to is this man claimed the right to buy something for the Government in a slightly different way from what perhaps it ought to have been done, but there was no fraud in it. The article was honestly bought and went into the service of the Government. As to "unjustifiable practices," I hardly know where they are in this volume. In their report they might have specified one or two and framed a count upon them. "Dereliction of duty," that is another harmless expression. This was all they could make after one year's most thorough and painstaking examination with an expert; but the expert said it was not conducted, according to his judgment, in the manner in which it ought to have been done; that he did not examine the Register's books in the Treasury as he thinks he ought to have done, and that he found no "crookedness" whatever from the beginning to the end.

That is the substance of the report. The usual nineteen hundred copies were printed under the rules and the report died, the House taking no action on it. The report was valuable, showing this Government office was better than we had supposed; otherwise no service was done to the world or the country except to furnish materials for a century of speeches from the gentleman from Ohio.

PURCHASE OF INK.

I hastily notice a few of the minor specifications of wrong-doing. The Printer is charged with purchasing ink improperly for the office; that is, without inviting competition; but that was done long ago under Mr. Clapp. Mr. Defrees took an entirely different course. Mr. Clapp used to aim to buy the best inks he could get, and buy at fair market prices. He did his work as any good business man would aim to do it. But Mr. Defrees felt compelled to resort to the contract system. He asked for bids, and he received them from nine cents up to twenty-two or twenty-five cents for ordinary kinds, with a higher price for some few special inks. I believe Mr. Defrees did not get as good ink as he thinks, but he got it a little cheaper, just as a man who should ask Chatham street to make bids for his clothing might get it cheaper, but would find himself not well or really so economically clothed, and I rather think that Mr. Defrees did not get quite as good ink as Mr. Clapp received. I differ with Mr. Defrees in that respect. I think that the ink he got was not as good. Probably it was not so well ground, or the lamp-black or other components were not so good. I think it is altogether possible that you might be able on some pages to rub a black shade across the printed sheet even with clean fingers, [laughter,] because the ink is not absolutely perfect.

But that Mr. Clapp bought honestly under his system and that Mr. Defrees bought honestly under his system no man denies; and he got his inks cheaper, and for many purposes—for many of these documents—it undoubtedly answers very well and is an economy in that respect.

PURCHASE OF PAPER.

The book-paper used at the Government Printing Office is bought under the supervision of the Joint Committee on Printing in a very careful and systematic way. The joint committee of the two Houses issue proposals; the paper-makers are invited to bid; the committee award, and contracts are signed. The Printer gets a good paper at a fair price, but some little difficulty arises. It is quite impossible to make the paper of absolutely uniform tint and absolutely uniform quality, and men who are critical, as Mr. Spofford, of the Congressional Library, will point out defects. You cannot have so good and so uniform paper as if you made long contracts, ordering all of a certain class from one mill. You are subject to the accidents of the competition. Every business man understands that in a moment.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman does not want to mislead the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly not.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Committee on Printing had the supervision of the purchase of ink?

Mr. HAWLEY. No, sir; but only the purchase of paper. The larger portion of the paper is purchased under the charge of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I misunderstood the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HAWLEY. The paper for binding is bought by contract after competition, but not under the supervision of the joint committee. The mass of the book-paper is bought in that way.

PURCHASE OF MACHINES.

Now, another allegation is made concerning the machines which have been purchased there. The Government Printer simply did as any wise manager of business would do. He saw machines which would do the work of three, four, five, six, eight, or ten hands, and he bought them. In the first place he tried one or two, and then bought nine, and afterward four more of the wire-sewing machines. Now, sir, one of those machines running a fair number of hours, an average number of hours, for a year will save its $1,500. I will not detain the House by reading the certificates which I hold here from the foremen of those different branches. I have them here, however, and beg leave to print.

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, March 13, 1880.

DEAR SIR: The machinery introduced in the electrotype and stereotype foundry at the Government Printing Office during the past year has resulted in great economy of time and expense, as well as a very manifest improvement in the quality of the work.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,

TO HON. J. R. HAWLEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

ALEX. ELLIOTT, JR.,
Foreman of Foundry.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, March 13, 1880.

DEAR SIR: I hereby certify that the recent introduction of improved fast-printing machinery in place of the old, worn-out Adams presses has enabled me to do twice the amount—and of a far superior quality—of press-work that I was able to do on the old presses, and at a less cost for labor.

Respectfully, &c.,

O. H. REED, Foreman Press-Room.

Hon. J. R. HAWLEY.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, March 13, 1880.

Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY:

I hereby certify that the recent introduction of Chambers's book-folding machines in the Government Printing Office will enable me to do the character of folding which can be done on them for at least one-half the cost when done by hand.

The wire-stitching machines do the work better than by hand, and at a saving of two-thirds.

J. W. Jones's hydraulic paper and book-pressing machines are a great saving, and are invaluable to this office.

Respectfully, &c.,

THOS. B. PENICKS,
Superintendent Folding-Room, Government Printing Office.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, March 13, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: I hereby certify that the introduction of the wire book-sewing machine in the Government bindery has resulted in a great saving of the public money, as is shown by the table herewith inclosed.

Respectfully,

J. H. ROBERTS,
Foreman United States Government Bindery.

Hon. J. R. HAWLEY.

The treasurer of the Wire Book-Sewing Machine Company, of Philadelphia, both telegraphs and writes me that his company alone has—

Ever made or can make in the United States the wire book-sewing machines. No machines have ever been sold or offered by any one connected with the company for less than the price at which they were sold to the United States Government.

One hundred and twenty-four of these machines are in use in this country and Europe, and they were in use in the great binderies of Sir Sidney Waterlow and others, in Europe, months before this Government ever took them on trial.

One reason we are able to do more printing in late years than before, and not increase the cost in proportion, is found just here in the introduction of these machines. The new inventions enter every field in the office, save in the labor of type-setting, and in time that will be done by machinery also.

PURCHASE OF PRESSES.

Mr. Defrees was charged with buying printing-presses improperly; that is, by direct purchase without bidding, and yet what use is there in advertising that one wants so many Cottrell & Babcock presses or so many Adams presses, for no one can furnish them but Cottrell & Babcock and Adams. Why should he issue proposals for a Hoe press or a Walter press? It would be foolish for him to do otherwise than he has done—that was to buy at the market price of the makers of standard presses. There is no specification that any of these articles have been bought above the market price.

His coal, oil, cloth, flour, envelopes, lead-pencils, horse-feed, leather, and ice have been duly purchased of competing bidders.

THE PURCHASE OF TYPE.

A charge has been made against him in the matter of his purchase of type. I will put into my printed speech a letter of Bruce's Son & Co., who sold that type:

OFFICE OF GEORGE BRUCE'S SON & CO.,
No. 13 CHAMBERS STREET, NEW YORK,
December 24, 1878.

SIR: Yours of the 21st instant, inclosing slip from newspaper about Representative FINLEY's committee, headed "Rotten to the core," is received. It is not, we perceive, a regular report of the examination, but a sensational article, as evidenced by its very headings.

You ask us what truth there is in the testimony that deductions have been made on prices of type to private establishments, and also state that it is very likely we will be brought before the committee.

Our answer we wish to make very plain in order to avoid the discomfort of a journey for the purpose of appearing before the committee, though we are well aware it is not under oath. However, we are willing to make it so.

We know nothing about this investigation except that which is in your printed slip, and, in order to make our statement clear to you or to any one else, will proceed seriatim.

According to this article, Mr. John G. Judd testifies that it was customary to make a discount of 5 to 15 per cent. from same price-list.

The article goes on to state that before this discount was made nonpareil was fifty-eight cents per pound; brevier, forty-eight cents; long primer, forty-two cents, &c. This article is evidently garbled, and we do not believe that Mr. Judd swears to that.

The new price-list lowering the prices of those articles was made after your type was bought and delivered, about the 20th of November, 1878, by most of the type foundries in the United States meeting at Cleveland, Ohio, and making that new low list to take effect December 16 and not before. We inclose you a circular from the northwestern type-founders, received 21st instant, and dated September 16, giving their reasons for this reduction. We do not belong to the Type Founders' Association, but cannot fight the whole country even with a better article, and so since the 16th of this month have come down in our prices, as you will see by the bill of December 21, pica thirty-eight cents, long primer forty-two cents, and brevier forty-eight cents, which agrees precisely with Mr. Judd's last statement. All your late purchases of Roman type, except that just referred to, had been made before the reduction took place: Long primer fifty cents, brevier fifty-five cents, and nonpareil sixty-six cents, which were until then our printed price, and may be found on page 3 of our abridged specimen book. We print thereon, in capital letters, that these prices are net cash. What is the use of driving away custom if we do not stick to it. [By not sticking to it!]

Mr. Larcombe, the next witness, according to this article, testifies correctly as to the prices we charged your office before the 16th of the month when the new prices took effect.

We sold you from April 1 to August 10, $1,476.01; August 30 to December 11, $37,091.33; total, $38,567.34. What other firms supplied the balance of the $41,470.02 we know not.

Mr. Thomas J. Brady, according to this article, testifies that recently his office at Muncie, Indiana, had to be replenished and he bought type at 35 to 43 per cent. discount from price-lists which were 7 to 10 per cent. below Bruce & Co.'s. The type-foundry lists, ours included we believe, are all uniform, and we do not believe the statement that he bought so cheaply. [Mr. Brady said 10 to 30 per cent. discount, on a few small things 35 to 43. He said: "We had been trading a long time at Cincinnati, and Chicago wanted to get the trade away from Cincinnati."]

To conclude, we sold you on our regular terms, and all orders your office may send us will be filled in the same way.

If you had delayed your large order till December 16 you would have been supplied cheaper, but you did not know that, nor did we. Type have been sold cheaper and they have been sold dearer than we sold you lately, and we ourselves and other type-founders have sold below cost for some small amount to beat those who have electrotyped our articles and stolen the production of our brains. But we will not do that for any large amount, as we do not intend to work for nothing. Some of our western foundries have been cutting one another's throats, we are aware, and are sick of it. (vide the circular.) The prices in that circular are the standard prices since the 16th instant.

The fonts we have supplied you with are uniform; they have the accents to match them, not imperfectly, but exactly—Roman lower-case, caps, small caps; Italic lower-case and caps; longs and shorts of both Roman and Italic. You need not be ashamed of it. We consider it a first-rate advertisement. We doubt very much if any other foundry could supply your order so well and so quickly as we did, and many of the foundries could not furnish you with the sorts as quickly as you must have them.

We sold you at our regular prices, as we supplied the two mercantile agencies in this city with forty thousand pounds of agate each at full printed prices. They were afraid their orders would not be executed promptly by other parties, and we presume you may have been in the same situation.

Allow us to call your attention to the fact that when you first ordered brevier from us, in 1861, you wished a large-bodied brevier, such as was then in use in your office, which would consume about one-tenth more paper than that we furnished you according to our regular size; and seeing the economy you took our regular size.

We mentioned casually to your predecessor, Mr. Clapp, that type should be contracted for, as we had bid for it once or twice. He replied that the Printing Committee had decided that type were not printing materials.

If you wish your type to match with that you had formerly for justification, and the works you now turn out to be uniform with the others from the Government Office from its foundation, you could not be supplied elsewhere without a great expenditure.

Compare the type made by us with the work turned out by Wendell. Senator ANTHONY, who is an old printer, must understand this. Perhaps it would be well to let the committee read this letter. We do not know if it is the Printing Committee or a special committee.

Your obedient servants,

GEORGE BRUCE'S SON & CO.

JOHN D. DEFREES, Esq.,
Public Printer, Washington, D. C.

It is charged in that report, and has been charged I believe in the debate here, that he paid too much for type. He bought a large invoice of type in the summer and autumn of 1878. On the 16th of December the leading type-founders of the country entered into an agreement, very considerably reducing their prices. He could have bought after December 16 at a lower figure; and it is very easy for one who does not fairly state the whole case to make it appear he paid an extravagant price. But it is said, why did he not invite public competition? The Government Office began in 1861 with Bruce's type—there is none better in the world. Now type do not wear out uniformly. Any one can see that the type used daily wears rapidly. The blocks called "quads" which cause the spaces do not touch the rollers or the press at all and will last through generations of the types that contain letters. Then, again, the types which contain the exclamation points, the chemical signs, algebraic formulæ, the fractions, accents, quotations, and like, making a large proportion of the "sorts," as printers call them, do not wear out so fast because they are not so much used. Sometimes pages of the RECORD will contain none of them.

In an establishment like this the printer buys only what he needs for renewal. Should he open the purchase to competition he would receive type that would not "justify," as it is called, with the old. They would not precisely fit, and it is absolutely indispensable that the fitting should be precisely accurate. His most economical way is to go to the firm which furnished the first supply and get from them enough to make his assortment complete again, thus from time to time filling up what is worn out. Again, if he tries to buy whole fonts from the lowest bidders, he must sell off whole fonts as old metal, when they were only worn out in certain sorts. It would be found a most extravagant process, as any business man can very readily understand. That is the reason why Mr. Defrees went and bought his type as a prudent man would have done, buying it all from one firm, so that the new supplies fit the old. And the successive volumes of the RECORD and of numberless other publications have a uniform appearance.

WORKING ON TIME AND BY THE PIECE.

A very large part of the work in the establishment is done by the piece, and the rest is done on time. A small amount of that on time is done by men having permanent annual salaries. There are a great many there who work by the hour; but if there are but two hours' work in a day they are discharged at the end of two hours and paid only for two hours. This, of course, is nearly equivalent, as a matter of economy, to working by the piece. Sometimes these men are called upon to work twelve or even eighteen hours a day, and then they are paid accordingly. To those working by the piece the price for "composition" is apparently large. The law says the Public Printer shall pay not to exceed fifty cents per thousand ems. That is a rather large price as things are now; but it is not thought to be wrong on the whole. He is not bound to pay so much as that if he can get the work done more cheaply. But in estimating what should be the price these things had to be considered: sometimes a printer has a night's work of twelve hours and then come three days of light work or next to nothing to do, when Congress has adjourned over a few days, or has very brief sessions, or has ordered very little work. The man one night will get seventy-five cents' worth of work and then on another night he will get five dollars' worth, scarcely stopping to eat. Then there is the vacation in the summer, when sometimes there is little or nothing to do for many of the compositors. It is evident that if he has to live here and work for the Government he must have a pretty good price while he does work if his pay is to be on an average equal to that of decently paid workmen elsewhere.

RUNNING OVER THE FISCAL YEAR.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] said that Mr. Defrees could not tell what work would come within this fiscal year and what would run over into the next. It is obviously impossible for him to tell. Take what occurred last year. Take the extra session. That came unexpectedly and threw upon the Public Printer a vast amount of work and a great deal of what he was already engaged to do had to pass beyond the 1st of July into the next, or this, fiscal year. He said the RECORD work was done in the last fiscal year. No, sir. Only the daily RECORDS were completed in that year. The great bound volumes were shoved over past the 1st of July and came into the current fiscal year.

WASTE.

It was said that no intelligent explanation was given in regard to the waste paper and rags and all sorts of things of that description. Sir, every dollar of that is accounted for and is entered upon the books of the Treasury. Sales of extra documents are reported every month. If the investigating committee had sent its expert to the Treasury Department he would have found all this accounted for.

WASTE GOLD-LEAF.

A large space is covered by an attempt to account for the waste gold-leaf. Under the old system that was considered fairly a perquisite of the workmen in the bindery, and they used to save the rags and sponge with which they wiped off the gold-leaf, and in the course of a year they would be able to put a few dollars in their pockets from the sale of the gold. But in a fit of economy the old usage was abandoned, and by saving up the old rags and sending them to the Mint and having them carefully burned and assayed the Public Printer was enabled to get two or three or four hundred dollars in one year.

It was hardly worth while for the committee to waste many pages of testimony and to call many witnesses in regard to that matter.

ECONOMY.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] said that he believed he could show that $500,000 a year more than is necessary is expended on printing. Well, I wish he had shown it. It would have been a most marvelous thing. The total cost of the congressional printing, outside of the printing for the Departments, as given on page 27 of the report, was only $556,114.28. Now, I do not know where the gentleman could have saved $500,000 out of that; certainly the work could not have been done for $56,000.

There is not one Department of the Government that is able to show a surplus in its printing account. I have before me here the figures from the Department of the Interior, showing that that Department will need $44,000 more for its printing this year than last year, owing to the new bureau of the Geological Survey and the large increase of work in the Land Office, Pension Bureau, &c.; and in the Post-Office Department there will be needed a large amount more than in previous years. The first six months, compared with the first six of last year, called for $22,850.43 more. This is due to constantly increasing business, notably in the money-order business, foreign and domestic, the change in the registered-letter system dispensing with old blanks and calling for new stereotyping, printing, &c., &c.

The Treasury Department keeps even, but must have more next year. The War Department resolutely obeys orders and lives within its appropriation, but it is badly cut down, and needs more as a measure of economy.

THE VAST WORK DONE.

Members of Congress generally have a very slight idea of the amount of work done in this office. If they really desire hereafter or now to pursue the investigation, I advise them in the first place to read thoroughly the two speeches of Mr. Burdick, of Iowa, made in the last Congress and placed on our tables this morning. He spent a year on that investigation with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] and in his speeches gives a thorough explanation of the whole matter. In the next place I advise members to go into the Printing Office and talk with the very intelligent foremen there. And that reminds me that I must do justice to one of them who is a constituent of mine. He has been there for many years; he did not get his appointment through me, and I did not know he was here until he introduced himself a few years ago. I refer to Mr. Roberts, the foreman of the bindery. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] speaks of him as "that man Roberts," and refers to a transaction which took place many years ago and which he thinks was discreditable to Mr. Roberts. A firm in this city, Philp & Solomons, used to furnish the blank-books for the Government. That was stopped and the work was turned over to the Government Printing Office. At the time that was done Philp & Solomons had on hand a few hundred blank-books made chiefly for the Treasury Department, and naturally they wanted to get rid of them.

Now, Mr. Roberts, the foreman of the bindery at the Government Printing Office, bought those blank-books as blank paper. He told a little white lie about it. They were bound up into blank-books, but he bought them as blank paper, because he had a right to buy that; but he did not feel justified in buying blank-books, for it was his business to make such for the Government. But, mind you, while he bought them for $234, at about the price of the blank paper in them, with the knowledge and approval of all parties, the transaction was recorded, and resulted in a handsome saving to the Treasury, and Mr. Roberts put nothing into his own pocket by the operation. Yet some people tried to make a scandal out of that. Now I know the man, and you may work at him as long as you please, and you will always find that he is a very faithful, capable, patriotic, and honest man.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I know him.

Mr. HAWLEY. During this session of Congress the orders for papers printed to the extent of what is called the "usual number" of documents, that is to say 1,900, have amounted to 1,234; and 918 of the documents have been printed, amounting to 1,839,200 copies. Some of those documents are of but one page, some of them two or three or four pages; others of them make considerable volumes. By resolutions of the Senate, outside of these orders of the House, there have been ordered to be printed 42,275 copies; by resolution of the House 25,300 copies; making a total of documents ordered, and nearly all printed this session, of 1,916,675 copies.

Now if you add to that the larger volumes, such as the President's message with the accompanying documents, and large executive documents which are printed under a permanent statute, you will vastly increase the number of copies of documents printed at the Government Printing Office. I have not the number here, but the cost of printing such documents for the corresponding period of last year was $118,000. That work has been going on, and is now very nearly completed.

Gentlemen, let me surprise you a little by exhibiting one day's work in this House. One week ago to-day, March 9, resolutions were offered in this House for the printing of certain octavo volumes. They were 100,000 copies of the report upon forestry by Dr. Hough, and a further edition of 50,000 copies of a previous volume on forestry prepared under the Commissioner of Agriculture by the same gentleman;

20,000 copies of the report upon beet sugar and the manufacture of sugar from beets; 300,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture; 100,000 copies of the special report of the Commissioner of Agriculture upon the diseases of swine. Those resolutions were offered (I do not say the volumes were ordered) in one afternoon here, and referred to the Committee on Printing. You know from the titles that these volumes are likely to be printed. All will be printed in greater or less numbers. I venture to say that any one of those resolutions proposed to the House to-day would be carried by a large majority. They are all no doubt valuable books. Whether the exact number proposed ought to be printed or not I do not say. But what did this amount to in one day? Five hundred and seventy thousand octavo volumes—one day's proposed work!

Let me surprise you still more. I have here a letter from Mr. Defrees, the Public Printer, explaining the deficiency partly provided for in this bill. It is as follows:

SIR: The last session of the Forty-fifth and the first (extra) session of the Forty-sixth Congress ordered an amount of printing and binding greatly exceeding that ordered by any preceding sessions.

When the appropriation was made for the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1880, no estimate was made for the printing and binding for the extra session, as the necessity for holding it was not known.

The printing ordered at these sessions will make (exclusive of the RECORD) 44,118 octavo pages and 2,699,625 octavo volumes or copies, 25,862 quarto pages and 270,374 quarto volumes or copies, aggregating 69,000 pages and 2,969,999 volumes or copies, and many of them having costly illustrations.

The requisitions made by the Executive Departments for blanks and blank-books also exceed those of any other year.

The price of paper to be paid for from the first of the present month for the ensuing year is 15 per cent. greater than last year, as shown by the contracts just entered into by direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Of the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year there remains unexpended the sum of $300,000; so that, in view of the above facts, it will not be possible to do without the further amount of $450,000 as a deficiency, which I most respectfully ask shall be appropriated at once.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

JNO. D. DEFREES,
Public Printer.

HON. J. C. D. ATKINS,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations.
FEBRUARY 5, 1880.

It shows that the printing ordered in the last session of the Forty-fifth and the first session of the Forty-sixth (that is the extra session) amounted to 44,118 octavo pages—that is, pages of type, 2,699,625 octavo volumes, 25,862 quarto pages, 270,374 quarto volumes, the aggregate being 69,000 solid pages of type and 2,969,999 volumes or copies, many of them having costly illustrations. That was the work of the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress and the extra session of the Forty-sixth.

Now, I have said that the printing proposed here last Tuesday amounted to 570,000 volumes. Everybody can see that the Congressional Library is a magnificent establishment. Everybody who goes there is impressed by those long and lofty rooms and those crowded alcoves. How many volumes are there? Three hundred and seventy-six thousand, with a little more than one hundred thousand loose pamphlets. Many of the volumes are very thin and small; they do not equal the average of our documents in size; but if we suppose that they do, we last Tuesday were asked to print 194,000 volumes more than there are in the entire Congressional Library. In the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress and the extra session of the Forty-sixth there were ordered printed 3,000,000 volumes, which, without making allowance for the difference in size, (which ought to be allowed for,) amounts to eight times the entire number of books in that grand Congressional Library.

If you make allowance for the difference in the size of the books you would find the proportion nine or ten fold; for 270,000 of these documents were great quartos like the bound volumes of the RECORD, while the Congressional Library has not near so many of that size; many of the books are small, thin volumes. Undoubtedly in those two sessions you ordered at least eight times the number of volumes contained in that magnificent library. Yet you grumble when the Public Printer comes here for an extra appropriation. If you can show where he stole a dollar or wasted a dollar, that is all right; but do not blame him for the large cost of this work until you have counted up what you have ordered him to do. You gave him but $1,500,000 for this year. The average cost for printing during the last sixteen and three-quarters years (during which the country has grown greatly) is $1,668,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. KEIFER. I move that the gentleman be allowed five or ten minutes more to finish his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. The average expenditure for public printing during the last sixteen and three-quarters years was $1,668,516.63; and you gave the Public Printer for this year $1,500,000, which was $168,000 less than the average for all these years. He says that you piled up this work so that it was impossible to do it without $450,000 additional. Now, I hope the Committee of the Whole will not be so unwise as to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] which proposes to reduce this appropriation to $300,000. You ought rather to make it $450,000. The alternative is to appoint somebody who knows enough—somebody whom you can trust—to cut down the number of volumes. Undoubtedly if you provide that only twenty-five thousand of the Agricultural Report shall be printed, only ten thousand of the report on the diseases of swine, &c., you can appropriate less money; but I say the better plan is to meet this demand and be a little more careful for the future. I do not say that the aggregate is any too great, for I do not pretend to pass upon the wisdom of having all these works printed. There was one year, many years ago, when the printing amounted to $2,200,000. Considering the length of the extra session, and the number of valuable works increasing naturally from year to year, I am not sure but $1,950,000 is a moderate expenditure. Ten or fifteen years ago the same amount of work would have cost very much more. Last year the Printer got his paper at a moderate price. Now he is paying 15 per cent. more for white paper. Paper is one of the enormous items.

You ask if it is an economical office. It is vastly economical in comparison with the old extravagant and corrupt system. I would not have the Government go back to the contract system. It was full of dishonesty and waste. It was understood that when contracts were awarded large percentages went to a few newspapers, and for other political purposes. Look at the Covode investigation. It is a fact those things were done in those days; whatever we may say against ourselves we do not permit those things in our day. The political system then was full of it.

I do not say if the Harpers had that establishment, running it for themselves, in New York City, they might not run it a little more economically; but it is doubtful then. I mean only in this way; they might be able, living in New York, to jew the compositors down to a lower figure; but here the work being irregular, fifty cents one day and $2 the next, and the third nothing, fifty cents a thousand ems is not extravagant. They might manage in some way to get it down a little more cheaply, but in no other way can the Government have it done so cheaply. You make eight hours a day's work, and those who work by the day quit at the end of eight hours. Do not blame the department for that, if one-fifth less work is done in a day. A large part is done by the hour; so that does not make much difference.

I say the management of that office generally is good. I never looked into it with care until within three days, when I have been driven to it by the turn this debate has taken. I have read over a number of these documents and conversed with the very intelligent and capable foremen and clerks, and have been gratified to find how excellent that management is. The system on the whole is good. Mr. Defrees asked the First Comptroller of the Treasury and one of the Auditors to come over and look at his system and see whether any better plan of doing his business could be suggested. They came and examined, but recommended no change.

It is a matter of national pride. There is no such establishment in the country. Clearly no private citizen could afford such. Is it enterprising? I have known the printer to bring in here in the morning punctually eighty-eight pages of this RECORD, equivalent to a bound volume of two hundred and seventy-five or three hundred pages, which his office had set up and struck off in twelve hours. Both Houses ran their mills all the afternoon and evening, and made eighty-eight quarto pages, yet the literal report was on time. About five or six years ago, when the revisers completed the first edition of the Revised Statutes, a ponderous volume of some eleven hundred pages, it was over to the printer on Tuesday. It was laid on these tables printed and bound, a splendid volume, on Friday of that week. Who can do better? I append a statement from the First Auditor of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
March 13, 1880.

Hon. J. R. HAWLEY.

House of Representatives:

I hereby certify that vouchers are on hand in this office, belonging to the Public Printer, for the appropriation of 1880, amounting to $1,072,771.52; and further that vouchers have passed this office for payment for paper out of same appropriation, amounting to $323,751.34, and that accounts have passed this office, and are on the way to draft, amounting to $10,890.70; and that the Public Printer, by accounts rendered to this office, has accounted for all the moneys advanced to him by requisition, except the balance shown in accompanying statement, with which balance the Public Printer's accounts agree, as rendered.

R. M. REYNOLDS,
Auditor.

Amount of appropriation	$1,504,000 00
Amount added from sales of waste-paper	29,089 17

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in the general discussion of this bill, and should not have done so except for the fact that the Committee on Printing of this House has been referred to by several of those who have made speeches on this bill, and by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] on Friday, seemingly with an effort to connect said committee with whatever of crookedness might be found in the Printing Office itself. I will endeavor before I take my seat to explain the connection which the Printing Committee has with that establishment, and to show that we have no more control over it except in the purchase of one article, to wit, paper, than we have over any other Department of this Government.

This bill is not one of our regular appropriation bills. It is what is termed a deficiency bill, a bill to add something to the amount already granted for carrying on the business of the several Departments of the Government. And while, Mr. Chairman, bills of this character are regarded by me with great disfavor, the necessity for them growing, as it frequently does, out of the extravagant and unnecessary expenditure of money in these several Departments above and beyond that set apart for their use, yet candor compels me to admit that this is not always the case, but that sometimes the necessity for a deficiency bill comes of the fact that Congress has failed to make, at the proper time, sufficient appropriations, and at other times, out of circumstances which are unforeseen and which, as a matter of course, are not provided for in the general appropriation bills.

Such is the case to a certain extent in regard to the two largest items mentioned in this bill. The six-hundred-thousand-dollar item which it is asked shall be appropriated for the payment of marshals and their regular deputies grows out of the fact that, at the last session of Congress, there was a failure to appropriate for this purpose. The circumstances under which that failure occurred, I do not propose to discuss to-day. The history of the matter is familiar not only to the members of this House but to the whole country. It will be remembered that Congress put on the bill a rider which provided that no part of the $600,000 which we were ready to appropriate should be used for the purpose of paying special deputies who were to supervise elections, as we on this side believed, in the interest of the republican party.

The President was not willing to receive the $600,000 which we offered him upon the conditions we saw fit to prescribe, and the consequence was that the President having vetoed the bill, we adjourned without making that appropriation. Now the Committee on Appropriations comes forward and presents a bill proposing to appropriate $600,000 for the marshals and their regular deputies without any condition annexed; but gentlemen on the other side of the House, if I understand their purposes, propose to amend the bill and put upon it a provision for the payment of the special deputy marshals. And the argument which was used by the gentleman from New York on Friday last is that the law authorizing the employment of these special deputies having been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, therefore we should make haste and appropriate money for their payment and that an amendment should be put on this bill to that end.

While I admit, the law having been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, Congress has no right to resist it, and while in the future it may be deemed right and proper to make appropriations for these special deputy marshals, I hold that there is no duty imposed upon us requiring that we hasten into the presence as it were of said court with heads uncovered and feet unshod, saying, "May it please your honors we are ready to do your bidding; to appropriate this money, and to postpone other important business." These special deputy marshals are functus officio. They are no longer in office, and there is no special necessity for haste in this matter. We want some time to deliberate on it. It may be that we can couple some other provisions with the act making this appropriation which will save us from the presence and dictation of these pimps and spies hereafter, and therefore we ask that you accept the $600,000 we tender in good faith, and that you do not delay the passage of this bill by any offer on your part to put upon it an amendment such as is contemplated.

It is true the Supreme Court of the United States has decided the case. Its connection with it has ceased; it can deal with it no further. It is then a matter purely for the consideration of Congress, whether it make that appropriation to-day, or whether it will make it at some future day, or whether it will make it at all.

It may be the pleasure of this House to amend the bill according to the views of gentlemen on the other side, and make the appropriation in this bill; but if it does not, then no injustice has been done, because the same question will come up some other time during the session when we can all discuss it and vote upon it according to our respective views. We say, therefore, you had better take the $600,000 that is offered you in good faith and not undertake to encumber this bill with amendments. The purpose of the bill, not being a general but a special deficiency bill, is to meet cases of emergency. This is the view that the Committee on Appropriations has taken, and delay in passing the bill will undoubtedly work great detriment to individuals as well as to the Government. But no such argument can be made with regard to these special deputies, and the question in reference to their payment can be determined at any time hereafter. It is not urgent at this time.

Again, as to the $400,000 for the Government Printing Office. It will be remembered that in our regular appropriation bill for the present fiscal year we set apart for carrying on the Printing Office $1,500,000. We had before us the Public Printer and his chief clerk, and after a full discussion of the matter it was agreed on their part that this would be sufficient for all the necessities of the Printing Office during the current year. We gave them, therefore, all that was asked; but when we called the Public Printer before us at this session and asked the reasons why he wanted this additional appropriation of $450,000 he gave the following reasons, to which we should give due weight. Whether they explain fully the propriety of this demand or not, and how far these reasons satisfied the minds of the several members of the Appropriations Committee, will be found out before we get through with the question by the speeches and votes of gentlemen of the committee on both sides of the House. The reasons offered were—first, the extra session of Congress, which extended over a period of three months, which was entirely unanticipated when his estimates were made, and consequently no provision was made for it.

This we know to be true, and accounts in some measure for the deficiency appropriation demanded.

Again, he urged as a reason that there had been an increase in the prices of material to be purchased for the use of the Printing Office, especially in printing-paper, which has risen above 20 per cent. I think the contracts made will show that to be a fact. The third reason was that an extraordinary amount of printing had been ordered by the Forty-fifth Congress, (the two sessions of that Congress,) and the extra session of the Forty-sixth Congress. You have heard to-day what was said by General Hawley on that subject. It is perfectly certain to my mind, as chairman of the Committee on Printing, that an unusual number of books have been ordered to be printed, as stated by the Public Printer.

Gentlemen might say: are you not responsible for it as chairman of the Committee on Printing? To some extent I feel myself responsible, but to a very large extent I am not responsible; nor is any member of that committee responsible. For, be it known to you, that oftentimes when we make our reports to this House in favor of printing a limited number of a particular book or report the House will take charge of the matter and order perhaps four times as many books as your committee thought necessary. Such was the case when my friend from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] overran the committee on the question of printing a certain book—I forget what it was at this moment.

Mr. AIKEN. The report on forestry.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Yes, the forestry report; which has already been alluded to to-day as a most unnecessary expenditure of the public money.

Again, you find that in the last days of the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress there were numbers of books ordered to be printed, as to the printing of which adverse reports had been made by the Committee on Printing. To illustrate: Here is a work called a catalogue of the subjects—not of the books merely, but of the subjects contained in every one of the antiquated books that have been placed in the library of the Surgeon-General. Why, sir, there are thousands and thousands of volumes there, and a catalogue of the books had already been printed; but that was not satisfactory to the Surgeon-General and his friends. They must come to Congress and ask that a catalogue of all the subjects of the books contained in that vast library should be published for the benefit of the medical fraternity. The Committee on Printing, year after year, declined to recommend this printing, but in the last days of—I am not sure whether it was the extra session or the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress—on the very last day or day before the Congress adjourned, by a resolution sprung upon the House by some gentleman, the first two volumes of that catalogue were ordered to be printed. It was said there would be eight volumes of it, and five thousand copies of the first two volumes will cost the Government $20,000. And when you get through the work, even supposing the cost to be limited to $20,000 for each two volumes, you will find the eight volumes will cost you $80,000. And that is not the end of it. This library will continue to increase, the number of books will be augmented, and you will find from year to year, having commenced this work, the same demand will be made; it will be said, "We have gone into this matter; we have spent eighty or a hundred thousand dollars, and now we must have money to finish the job." It is a perennial outgoing stream. There is no end to it that I can see.

So of the Black Hills report which was gotten up, as I believe, in the interest of private individuals. A commission ordered by the Secretary of the Interior was sent out to survey the Black Hills in order doubtless to find where the rich lands were and where the gold mines were located; the idea being that the Indians would be driven out from the Black Hills, and then the gentlemen in possession of this knowledge, gotten up without any authority of law, would have the power to go and locate these lands ahead of those who had not this information. This work was ordered by the Interior Department. It was begun and carried on by that Department. And when it was found that matters did not take exactly the course that was anticipated, then the party that made the surveys that had been ordered by the Interior Department was remitted to Congress for his pay; and some thousands of dollars were voted to pay for the same. Congress, notwithstanding the Committee on Printing, time and again, refused to recommend the publication of the work, overruled the committee and ordered it to be published.

Congress has thus ordered printing to be done in these and in many cases without reflection in all probability. It has been done oftentimes over the head of the Committee on Printing and against their protestation. And yet, when the Public Printer comes and demands money for the publication of the works, you say the Printing Office has been most egregiously abused and the money has been misapplied.

I am no defender of the Printing Office. When I made my report to the Forty-fourth Congress on that subject, an elaborate report, and when I made a speech upon this floor explaining my views upon it, I thought and then said this Government Printing Office could be conducted more efficiently and economically, and that it ought to be so conducted. I have had no occasion to change my mind since. I have watched the management of this office, and while I am not able—I speak it in all truthfulness and I speak it because it is the truth—while I am not able to put my finger upon a single dollar which I believe has been stolen from the Government, yet I believe that by a change in that printing office, by putting a new man in charge, we can institute reforms that are necessary, and that a great saving can be made to this Government. I want it understood that I am no apologist for anything that has been done there. I know it has been sometimes said because I have not been ready to join in the hue and cry without knowing what I was doing, that I was favoring the present incumbent of the Government Printing Office.

The man who ventured upon that statement simply gave utterance to a falsehood, and he would not have said that much to my face. But I do not propose to throw dirt indiscriminately upon any officer of the Government without proof that he deserves such treatment.

I repeat again that I believe great reforms can be instituted in that printing office, and that they ought to be instituted. To that end I have offered an amendment, to which I shall presently speak, to change the Public Printer and see if something can be effected in that way. As it is now, the Public Printer is not amenable to this House nor to the Senate for his conduct. It is not right and proper that he should be so amenable. He oftentimes bears confidential relations to us. We are responsible to the country for the amounts of money we appropriate and for the use which is made of those amounts. The Public Printer makes his reports to this House, and we supervise his conduct and look over his accounts, although he settles them primarily at the Treasury. Yet he makes report to us of the amount of money expended by him, and it is not only the privilege but the duty of every member of Congress to look over his reports and see whether the money has or has not been properly expended according to the wish and the will of Congress.

I come now to speak of the amendment which I have proposed. It is no new thing here; it is no innovation upon the old system. I do not claim its paternity, nor can you consider it, as is sometimes the case in law, as filius nullius, the child of nobody. It has a respectable father in a gentleman from New York, once a member of this House, whose name was Ladin. It was introduced into this House by him. There are gentlemen here now, members of this House, who were present at the christening, and I might almost say that the present Executive of the United States stood godfather to the child, for I believe he voted for the measure throughout.

The proposition is a simple one and easily understood. If members will give me a patient hearing I will explain to the House in a few words the features of this amendment. It proposes simply to do away with the office of Public Printer, who is now a Government official, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and confer upon this House the power to elect a Congressional Printer who shall be responsible to this House, and who shall do the work of this House and the work of the Senate as well.

Then there is attached to the proposition a proviso which I deem vastly important, and I think gentlemen will agree with me. It is that this Congressional Printer shall, upon his election and qualification, make to this House an inventory of all the property in and about the Government Printing Office that comes into his hands, and that annually thereafter he shall make such inventory. There has never been any law providing for an inventory of this sort to be returned to Congress or to any Department of this Government. Whatever goes into the hands of the Public Printer he uses at his discretion, very much as he pleases. If the presses are worn out, in his judgment, he sells them and buys new ones. If the fonts of type become old and unfit for use, he buys new fonts. And so it is with his wagons, and horses, and everything necessary to carry on the establishment. As it is, you do not know what amount of public property is there belonging to the Government.

This provision of law should have been enacted long since, for the reason that at the end of each year we should know what property we have in and about the Printing Office; and still further, we should know whether the officer has abused his privileges in purchasing property, new type, new presses, horses, wagons, and the like; we should be able to understand whether he has squandered the money set apart for his use. It seems to me no gentleman can object to that proviso.

The question comes up whether there is any constitutional difficulty in the way of making this printer a Congressional Printer. According to the views which I have upon the subject, there is no such difficulty. I ask gentlemen for a moment to turn to the Constitution of the United States. In the last clause of section 2 of the Constitution is the following language:

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

In section 3 is this language:

The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

Then further on, in section 5, will be found this language:

Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same.

Now, it seems to me that these provisions of the Constitution remove all difficulties. If we are authorized to elect our own officers, and we elect a Congressional Printer, and if it is our duty to keep a record of our proceedings and publish them from time to time, how can it be better done than through an officer responsible to this House for his election and the tenure of his office? I find that this same view of the subject was entertained by distinguished republicans in the Senate when the question was under consideration in that body. I will refer to some portions of the debates which then and there occurred:

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I should like to ask the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill if he is clear that there are no constitutional objections to its passage?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not suppose my opinion on a matter of constitutional law would be of much value by the side of that of my friend from Oregon. I suppose it would not be competent for the Senate to elect a Superintendent of Public Printing, but it is competent for the Senate to elect a Congressional Printer, who shall be deemed an officer of the Senate. It is so stated in the bill. Then I suppose it is competent by law to devolve on that officer of the Senate any duties we see fit. * * * But I will leave the lawyers of the Senate to settle the constitutional point; it has not distressed me any.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I think the Senate has a perfect right to elect this officer by virtue of express power granted by the Constitution. By the Constitution each House is permitted to elect its own officers. By the Constitution each House is required to keep a journal of its proceedings. These duties may be legitimately devolved upon an officer elected by the Senate.

If these duties may be legitimately devolved upon an officer of the Senate, of course they may be devolved upon an officer of the House, for we have the same right to elect our officers that the Senate has to elect its officers.

Says Mr. LANE further:

After the Senate has elected a Public Printer, an act of Congress may transfer into his hands all the duties which now devolve upon the Superintendent of Public Printing. I think these two express grants of power in the Constitution cover the whole case—the right of each House to elect its own officers, and the constitutional obligation to keep a public journal of its own proceedings.

We find by referring to the yeas and nays in the Senate upon the passage of this bill, voted on in 1867, when both Houses of Congress were republican, the yeas were 27 and the nays 8. Among those voting "yea" were Messrs. ANTHONY and Chandler, and Mr. Sherman, at present a member of the Cabinet.

The bill was then sent to the House, and passed by this body—yeas 99, nays 38. Among those voting in the affirmative were Mr. DAWES, now a Senator; Rutherford B. Hayes, now President of the United States; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and I believe my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken. I did not vote for the bill. I have the record here.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Let us see now how this matter stands.

Mr. GARFIELD. The present Speaker of the House voted against the bill, I notice, as well as every other democrat except two or three.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I may have misapprehended the gentleman; but I do not think I have.

Mr. GARFIELD. I can assist the gentleman to the page, if he wants it. Thirteen hundred and fifty-one is the page of the Globe, of February, 1867.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Wait one moment; let us go a little back of that, if you please.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Well, I believe the gentleman did not vote upon the passage of the bill; but when the proposition was made to lay on the table the House bill introduced by Mr. Laffin, the gentleman voted against laying it on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; for I wanted some legislation; I did not want to kill the bill as the democrats wanted to do.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman voted against laying the bill on the table, which was immediately afterward passed without a division.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I find the gentleman's vote recorded here with others. Here are the names of some of them, Mr. GARFIELD, Mr. Hayes, Mr. KELLEY, Mr. O'NEILL, Mr. ORTE, Mr. PRICE—

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. All of whom voted against the proposition made from this side of the House to lay on the table the House bill which gave the House power to elect the Public Printer.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; we wanted to amend it and make a decent bill of it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. A few minutes afterward, as the record goes on to show, the bill was passed, and no protest was made by the gentleman against it.

Mr. FRYE. That was a republican House; was it not?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. It was.

Mr. FRYE. Well, we might be willing to trust a republican House when we would not trust a democratic House.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I think it very likely. You are blind enough to trust a republican House with anything. I think you are unable to see any fault in the members of your party, and are willing to "go it blind."

Mr. McMAHON. The people differ with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] They would rather trust a democratic than a republican House.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the whole matter—the beginning and the end—the Alpha and Omega of the proposed amendment. When the Printing Office was first established the Superintendent of it was a Government officer—was nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate; and so he continued until 1867 when Mr. Laffin, concluding that a change was necessary, introduced a bill substantially the same as the proposition I have presented here—a bill which was amended by the Senate in unimportant particulars, the only important amendment being the striking out of the provision for electing a Congressional Printer by the House and inserting a provision for electing him by the Senate, making him an officer of the Senate instead of an officer of the House. That bill passed this House as I stated without a division, after a vote had been taken refusing to lay it on the table. The bill went to the Senate, as I have said, and, after the amendments I have stated, became a law. So the law continued from 1867 until the Forty-fourth Congress, when a report was made showing great abuses, as we believed, in the Printing Office, and so aggravated in character that it was deemed proper to get clear of the incumbent. Upon the proposition in the Forty-fourth Congress to abolish the office of Congressional Printer and establish the office of Public Printer I believe the yeas and nays were never called. My recollection is that it was the general sentiment of the House that we ought to abolish the office of Congressional Printer and create that of Public Printer, so as to get rid of the incumbent.

Under that system matters have gone on until this time. We now simply propose by this bill to put the election of Printer into the hands of the House, as you gentlemen once had it, or if you please, into the hands of the Senate, if the Senate shall think proper, making this officer responsible for his conduct directly to one House or the other, with power to remove him without the tedious process of impeachment. This is the whole question. I submit it for the consideration of the House. Not wishing to detain the House longer, and asking pardon for the length of time I have consumed, I yield the remainder of my hour to my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I was not aware until a few minutes ago that I was to have the opportunity of saying anything on this subject, and, in what I do say, I do not propose to evince any of that acrimony which, so far, seems to crop out on both sides of this House. I have statistics which I propose to refer to and from them draw such conclusions as may seem proper and just.

The Committee on Printing, of which I am a member, have not during this Congress investigated the Government Printing Office. The investigations to which reference has been made were had by committees of previous Congresses. Those committees came to the conclusion that the Government Printing Office was not managed in the interests of economy. I do not propose to hold Mr. Defrees, the gentleman at the head of that office, responsible, or to treat him other than his action shall deserve. He is an old man now, "in the sore and yellow leaf," and as he himself stated in a letter printed in the National Republican, "I have arrived at that time of life when I cannot long expect to have any interest in public printing." He is at the head of the largest printing establishment in the world, and if we are to rely on the testimony taken before these investigating committees of previous Congresses there is waste everywhere in that department, and the large deficiency which is said to exist there calls for an investigation on the part of this House to secure if possible some better management of that vast establishment.

Inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Printing, the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] has discussed very ably the proposed amendment from that committee, I will not take up the time of the House further on that subject, but will call attention to several points which have not heretofore been made as far as I am aware.

I take it there are none more familiar with the workings of that department than the employes who have been engaged in the public service there for a long time, and gentlemen who have been indorsed as credible and honest by Mr. Defrees himself; men whom he employed in that department because of their capacity, their integrity, and their honesty. Therefore I wish to bring the attention of this House to an important statement made by those employes in a letter which they addressed to Congress or to the public. For, sir, if they are correct in their statement there is an egregious error in the accounts of Mr. Defrees, an error which this House ought to correct by changing the management of that department.

I hold in my hand this letter, signed by Alfred Thomas and others who have been employed by Mr. Defrees. They say in this letter:

What was applicable to the case last March has been presented to us in a more aggravated form since that time, for during the months of April and May last one-half of the entire force of the office was furloughed, and in June the business of the office was almost entirely suspended.

This House is informed by those gentlemen who are conversant with the facts by their personal experience that in those months named more than half the force was furloughed. Turn to Mr. Defrees's account and see how he disbursed for these months the money appropriated to that office, and see how it squares with the statement made by these employes. By looking to the last report of the Public Printer, on page 29 you will find a statement showing the disbursements of pay to employes on account of public printing (except the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD) for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879.

Understand, these employes say that for the months of April and May the force was more than half reduced. You will find for the month of April the payment was $61,052.67, for the month of May $51,105.54, and for the month of June, when the force was almost entirely out of the building, $55,683.97, or, in round numbers, $56,000. You will discover in this report that in December, January, February, and March, when the work was up to its fullest capacity, when these employes were all there, the pay-roll is but little larger; that for the month of February he charged on pay-roll $66,294, and for the month of March $58,812.93; while for April, the time when these gentlemen say the force was not half there, he charged on account of pay-roll $61,052.67; that for the month of May, when half the force was away, $51,105.54; and for the month of June, when, according to the statement of these gentlemen, there were but half of the employes there, $55,683.97. I do not undertake to say this is correct or incorrect; but I do undertake to say if those employes have given correct information there is something wrong in the accounts of the Public Printer.

Nearly a year ago, or last year, there was a pamphlet laid on the desks of members of this House, published by Mr. Franklin Rives, a gentleman who heretofore published the proceedings and debates of Congress in the Congressional Globe. He is said to be a gentleman of reliable character, of integrity and honor, who has had the indorsement, time and again, of both parties in this House and the Senate, a gentleman familiar with the workings of a printing office—and I desire to call attention to some points in that pamphlet in the hope some friend of Mr. Defrees may be able to explain the deficiency charged against the Government Printing Office. On page 6 of Mr. Rives's pamphlet there is the remarkable statement that, in four years and nine months, there has been a deficiency in the accounts of the Public Printer of $1,021,346.86.

Mr. HAYES. Why do you not investigate it and find out whether it is true or not?

Mr. WILSON. My friend across the way received the pamphlet when I received it, and he has had the same opportunity to investigate it that I have had.

Mr. HAYES. Then do not bring in charges trumped up by parties who want to break down the Printing Office in order to secure the contract for themselves.

Mr. WILSON. I quote from a gentleman who is regarded to be as reputable as any man connected with the public printing.

Now, sir, from that statement we find from September 30, 1873, to June 30, 1878, four years and nine months, taking stock on hand, labor performed, and money paid out, &c., there is a deficiency or balance unaccounted for of $1,021,346.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How long a period?

Mr. WILSON. Four years and nine months.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. A pretty lively deficiency.

Mr. WILSON. Now, I undertake to say—and I ask my friend and colleague on the committee, Mr. HAYES, the question—I ask him to say to this House, from what he knows on that subject, whether he does not believe, candidly and honestly, printer as he is, that he can take charge of that department and save the Government a quarter of a million dollars a year?

Mr. HAYES. I want to say this, that if what the gentleman has read from that pamphlet be true, if he believes it to be true, the democratic majority in this House should be arraigned before the country for not investigating such a fraud as that.

Mr. FINLEY. In reply to that I desire to say that the democratic party in the Forty-fifth Congress did investigate it and endeavored, over and over again, to get it before the House; but gentlemen on that side of the House objected.

Mr. HAWLEY. Did not the gentleman from Ohio spend one year in investigating that matter, and did he report one line of this deficiency to Congress?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say that the "gentleman from Ohio" did investigate the Government Printing Office, and I did make a report to this House, and every time we undertook to bring that report up objection was made by gentlemen on that side of the House.

Mr. HAYES. Why did not the gentleman impress upon the democratic majority of the House the fact that he had some evidence of a substantial character to justify the charges he made? If they are judged by their action they have not a word of evidence in support of the assertion the gentleman from Ohio made.

Mr. WILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. As the gentleman has sought to arraign this side of the House for not having acted in this matter, I propose to remind the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES] of a certain fact in connection with the Forty-fourth Congress. It will be remembered that an elaborate report was made showing the corruption in the Printing Office and in the head of that office. But when the office of Public Printer was abolished, and he was turned out, because of his malfeasance or corruption in office, yet, sir, the republican President at once restored him to office, and he remained until Mr. Hayes came in.

Mr. HAYES. When was that?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. In the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. HAYES. What report is that to which you refer?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. It was the report made by Mr. Vance and myself.

Mr. HAYES. Did the democratic House take action upon that report?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Unquestionably we did.

Mr. FINLEY. The democratic House passed the bill recommended, but the republican Senate refused to pass it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. We put a resolution through this House calling upon the courts of the District to indict the incumbent then in office, but no notice was ever taken of it.

Mr. HAYES. That was not Mr. Defrees at all.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. No; but it was the head of that office.

Mr. HAYES. Charges were not made against Mr. Defrees.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. We have no control over the Public Printer. He is your Public Printer, and we only look to the management of the office and the appropriations for its support.

Mr. HAYES. But the gentleman from Mississippi has admitted in his speech that you have the power of impeachment over this officer.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. We can impeach, it is true, but we have had experience in that line, and everybody knows what it amounts to. We can impeach him and the Senate can turn him loose.

Mr. HAYES. But the Senate is democratic.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. That may be so at present, but it was not democratic then. He is confirmed by a republican Senate. He is your Printer, not ours.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope the gentleman from West Virginia will allow me to say a word in response to what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois. I cannot consent for the remark of the gentleman to go unanswered when he says that the action of the democratic party on this side of the House showed that that party had no confidence in the report which I made on this subject. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois in reply to that, that the report submitted to the Forty-fifth Congress was signed and adopted by every democrat on my committee. It was a majority report, and we were here on the floor of the House time and again, day after day, asking action for two months; but inasmuch as the committee was not called we could only get it in by unanimous consent; and time and again when we tried to get unanimous consent objection was made by gentlemen on that side of the House, so that it will not do now for gentlemen to say that the action of this side of the House went to show that no faith or credence was given to this report. It was not this side but that side of the House that refused to allow this report to come in at all.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that their report charged the Public Printer with malfeasance or dishonesty or any irregular practices?

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will read the report he will find that it does most emphatically.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask if those charges which were incorporated in the report in the first instance were not stricken out by democrats?

Mr. FINLEY. There were no charges stricken out by democrats.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot yield further. I asked my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to indulge me to propound a question or two, and he denied me the privilege. I have been more liberal to others than others have been to me, but I must now resume the floor.

I stated what the charges were which were made by Mr. Frank Rives. Let us now turn to the Senate debate and see how he was indorsed by Senator ANTHONY, a republican, at the time he was printing the congressional debates:

It is but fair to say in the beginning that the Congressional Globe, by Rives & Bailey, has been printed to the entire satisfaction of Congress. The work has been done well and promptly, and we have had no complaint of it. Like good air and good water and good health, we do not hear anything about it until we begin to miss it.

That gentleman received as unqualified and as high an indorsement from both sides of this Chamber and from both parties in the Senate as perhaps any Congressional Printer ever did.

I am not invoking any democratic testimony here but I propose to refer to the testimony of gentlemen who are high in the republican ranks, gentlemen whose word, I take it, will pass current on the other side of the Chamber. I refer to the testimony of Mr. Brady, and quote from the report of the printing investigating committee, page 13:

Hon. Thomas J. Brady, Second Assistant Postmaster-General, testifies that on a recent purchase of type and other printing materials, of the gross amount of $2,000, the seller made a reduction of from 35 to 43 per cent. This committee, therefore, believes that had the Public Printer complied with the law inviting competition in the purchases made, he would have secured the same advantage of low prices and proportionate discounts and reductions upon the purchases he has made, which would have saved to the Government within the past year alone many thousands of dollars.

Now, look at the report of the Public Printer and take the aggregate amount paid out by him for the purchases he has made, take the rebate, the reduction extended to the Post-Office Department, and you will find that a large amount in this regard, and in all perhaps several hundred thousand dollars, could have been saved.

The other day a proposition was made to take that printing office at 10 per cent. less than what it now costs and pay to the Government $100,000 for the use of the office annually. It may be that Mr. De-frees is so far advanced in life as not to be physically able to manage this most extensive printing house in the world.

I will not attempt, Mr. Chairman, to follow gentlemen in the discussion of the amendment we propose to offer. There is one important item in that amendment that we think will save to the country a very large amount of money. That is the amendment requiring that there shall be an invoice made of the property in the Government Printing Office. Perhaps there is no government establishment of this kind in the world as large as this, and I will undertake to say there is no private establishment conducted as loosely and carelessly as this one is. It wants a safeguard and protection thrown around it. An invoice of the property should be made, so that Congress may be informed of the amount of material it has on hand.

There is only one other point to which I propose to call the attention of the House. I propose now to read from the evidence of two gentlemen who heretofore held high positions, as I understand it, in the Government Printing Office. They are Mr. H. T. Brian, for seven years foreman of the Government Printing Office, and Mr. M. D. Helm, foreman of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as I have been informed. Those gentlemen, who were thoroughly educated to the printing business, thoroughly acquainted with all its minutiae, having had many years of experience in that business, and one of them at least in that establishment, testify that in their opinion there can be some 30 to 40 per cent. of saving effected in the amount expended. If that saving can be effected it will amount in the aggregate to $250,000, or $300,000, or perhaps $400,000 a year. In 1877 the Public Printer asked for $2,040,000; there was appropriated in all $1,524,000. In 1879 he asked for $1,991,000; there was appropriated $1,793,000. I do not give the fractions.

Now, if these two experienced gentlemen, familiar with the details of the office, familiar with all its workings and all its ramifications, have given testimony which is reliable, the Government can save 30 to 40 per cent. per annum on this expenditure; it would save 30 to 40 per cent. on $1,700,000. It seems to me we are not offering a proposition that is improper or unconstitutional. We offer a bill which simply proposes to do exactly what the republican party did at the time when President Andrew Johnson put a democratic printer in charge of that office, when he appointed Cornelius Wendell. He was in office a short time, perhaps not more than a few months, when, as I understand, a bill was originated in this House proposing to take from the President the appointing power. It passed the House, giving the appointing power to the House, and received the sanction of every republican on this floor.

It went to the Senate and was there amended so as to allow the Senate to elect the Congressional Printer, and so amended it received the sanction of every republican there; and here upon the floor of this House President Hayes voted for that bill when it was first reported, authorizing the House to make the appointment. It came back from the Senate amended so as to have the appointment made by the Senate, and President Hayes voted for it again.

I have heard it stated that the probability is that he might veto this bill. I have too high a regard and too much respect for President Hayes to believe that he would veto now a bill which received his sanction when he was a member of this House. As a member of Congress he took an oath to support the Constitution and to discharge his duties faithfully; as President, he took an oath to support the same Constitution. Now, I take it that if it were proper for him then as a member of Congress, acting under the solemnity of an oath, to do a particular thing, he will not now repudiate it.

I will not now detain the committee longer; but if this amendment shall be offered, I propose then to say something further upon the subject.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the Committee informally arose; and Mr. HUNTON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, was received, announcing that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1408) to further amend the act entitled "An act to reorganize the courts of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and to amend section 861 of chapter 24 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] on Friday last, when he reported this bill, took occasion to make the statement that the bill providing for the pay of marshals was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations on the 21st of January, and that it had been withheld from that time to the present by the unanimous instruction of the committee. That is true, but stated as the gentleman states it it has a tendency to mislead the House and the country.

The facts of the case are these: the estimate came to Congress early in December, and before the House commenced considering its new rules there was substantially one month in which to report a deficiency bill making appropriations to pay the fees due the marshals; but the Committee on Appropriations did not consider or report such a bill, nor did the House take any action on the subject. I speak of that merely to correct a misapprehension that might wrongfully grow out of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio.

There are but two provisions in this bill that provoke discussion. As to all the other provisions of the bill, I apprehend that there will be no dissent in this Committee of the Whole, and there will be none in the House.

One of the objectionable provisions is the rider which it is proposed to place on the bill by direction of the Committee on Printing, represented by its chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.] The other is the provision in relation to the pay of marshals, which is objectionable because it does not go far enough.

I do not want to take a great while in considering the rider which it is proposed to place upon this bill, provided you can run over the point of order and stretch the rule broad enough to make it cover the proposed amendment. I say I do not want to talk long about it, because the committee reporting this bill has not made any very thorough investigation of the matter. I have upon my own motion made a slight investigation, by examining reports and such data as I could get. I have listened attentively to the remarks made by the gentlemen on the other side, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON,] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.] I have come to this conclusion, and I will give you the reason for it in a few words: they undertake without one particle of evidence, without any man rising in his place and making himself responsible for the facts he states under cover of loose charges, to blacken the character of a white-haired old man whose whole life has been blameless, in order that they may turn him out of office and put in his place one of their party friends.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. That is it exactly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It would have been more manly for you to have said: "We want to turn out this Public Printer; we have no fault to find with him, but we want his place in order that we may put in it one of our own men; and we propose to change the law for that purpose by means of a rider upon an appropriation bill." That would have been the manly way, and that is almost the ground upon which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] did put it.

But it remained for the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] and the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON,] without any evidence, upon mere suspicion, to get up and try to impugn the character of this gray-haired old man who, it may be said, has one foot in the grave. I admire the manliness of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] far more than—I was going to say the cowardice of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] and of the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON;] and I do not use the term in any objectionable sense.

Now, what is this amendment? It is merely a proposition to change the Public Printer.

Mr. WILSON. I beg permission to ask the gentleman whether he made any allusion to me just now?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I did speak of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] and said that I admired the courage of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] who marches up bravely and says that he cannot place his finger on one dollar of misappropriation of the Public Printer, far more than I do the want of outspoken fairness on the part of the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON,] who seeks to do the same thing under cover that the gentleman from Mississippi does publicly and avowing it.

Mr. WILSON. I beg leave to say to the gentleman that if he means to intimate that I have acted improperly or dishonorably—

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. WILSON. I have attempted nothing under cover; what I do is done publicly and above board, and I am responsible for it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly, there is no necessity for any excitement about this matter at all. I am not speaking of the gentleman in regard to his personal character; I am speaking of the manner and mode of the attack which he chooses to make upon an officer of the Government.

Mr. WILSON. I have simply read from republicans high in your party, their testimony and their estimate. If they are to be believed, there can be effected a saving of three hundred or four hundred thousand dollars in that department.

Mr. FINLEY rose.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There has been much talk about the abuses of the Government Printing Office, the loose manner of keeping accounts, the chance to steal, the chance for property to walk away in the night-time, the want of accountability on the part of the Public Printer to Congress and the country. Why, gentlemen, you have investigated this office twice. All through the Forty-fourth Congress you investigated. During the last Congress you investigated until you made a book of nearly seven hundred closely printed pages. Did that investigation or either of them lead to a report to prevent any abuses? What amendment to the law have you made or recommended changing the manner of keeping accounts by the Public Printer? What avenue of stealing have you shut up? What reform have you suggested? Where is it? Do you propose it in your report, or in either of your reports? Not at all.

Mr. FINLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but—

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman puts a question, and then declines to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will please understand that the gentleman from Illinois does not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. FINLEY. All right.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Do you report resolutions of impeachment against the present Public Printer or did you against the former Public Printer? Not at all. Did the gentleman from Ohio, when he made this report, place in it even a recommendation that the present Public Printer should be impeached? Not at all. Oh, no! The crimes for which impeachment would lie are to be intimidated by the opposition upon the floor of this House rather than pointed out and sustained by evidence. While I am a member of this or any other Congress, no man, let his politics be what they may, shall be blackened with my consent by intimation and insinuation. If you have anything against any office-holder, state it, prove it, and hold him responsible. If he is in your way, turn him out like men, and say you want the place.

The gentleman from Ohio, when he was upon the floor once before to-day, claimed that the republicans would not allow him to press this report for consideration. These republicans are awful fellows. According to the gentleman, though they were in a decided minority in the last Congress, they had power enough to prevent the other side for two whole months from doing what they wanted to do. Heavens! if a minority is so powerful what would we do if we had a majority?

This is the excuse that is made for not having the report considered and for not amending the law. Have you not every chance now under this proposed motion? Is not the way to amend the law open? I have before me the amendment which my friend from Mississippi is going to move. Does it propose any change in the method of keeping accounts—any reform whatever? It is printed in the RECORD of last Saturday morning. Now that you have every opportunity, where is the revision of your code touching this Printing Office which you have been saying needed revising? I find it not upon the page of the amendment. If you will read the amendment and read it intelligibly, read it in a few words, it would be: "Resolved, That Mr. Defrees be turned out; and resolved, That we elect one of our fellows to fill his place." That is all there is in it. If there can be stealing done under the law as it now exists, there can be stealing done under the law as you propose to amend it.

But, said my friend, the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] the President appoints this officer; and we want a man elected by the House, so that we can hold him responsible to the House, and if he does not do right can turn him out. I thought my friend was not happy in that argument, because I recollect that during my short career in Congress, while the democratic party has had control of this House in two Congresses—this being the third, there have been one of your journal clerks and two of your Doorkeepers, whom the President could not possibly appoint under the Constitution, whom you have had to muster out.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. We have been so busy following up the rascals of your party, members of the Cabinet and others, that we have not had time to look over our own House. The gentleman said a moment ago that in the reports on the subject of printing nothing was proposed to be done in regard to the Public Printer. Now, if he will turn back to the report made by Mr. Vance, he will find that we adopted a preamble and resolution directly condemning the Public Printer and asking the courts of the District of Columbia to take cognizance of the matter and punish him for his misdeeds in office. What more could we do?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Was not the Public Printer impeachable?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. You had as well go to his Satanic majesty with an impeachment against one of his imps as expect a republican Senate to sustain such a proceeding against one of its officers. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Ah, the gentleman, with his democratic House to sustain him, was called upon to place on record articles of impeachment if this officer was guilty of any impeachable offense.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. When we undertook to prefer articles of impeachment against Mr. Seward, who acknowledged his sin, you will recollect how you filibustered and prevented us from doing so.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Oh, what foolishness for a man having a majority of nearly two-thirds of his party to support him to come in and say, "The minority filibustered and would not let us do it," when you could depose the Speaker, when you could change the rules, when you could do anything and everything that a majority wanted to do! You can to-day change the rules; and do it if you want to. That excuse will not avail.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman "is not very happy" in that argument.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois will give the Chair an intimation when he yields and when he does not yield, the Chair will protect him in his rights.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman said further, "we have been giving so much attention to the Cabinet officers and to the thieves in the republican party we have not had time to look after the democratic thieves." Well, when not looking after them in the House of Representatives, if you can catch one journal clerk and two Doorkeepers in two short Congresses, what in the name of heaven would you do if you went at it for a steady business? [Laughter.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. We would put them out whenever we found them to be doing wrong, as we did in the cases to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Ever since I have been coming to Congress, a period of some six or seven years, I have been deluged and snowed under almost by circulars, by letters, by papers, said to emanate from a man by the name of Rives who used to print the Globe for Congress. I would not be able to swear where Rives lives; never saw him in my life, but have been told he roosts over about the Blue Ridge, whether in the district of the gentleman from West Virginia or not I do not know, but it does not make any difference. I will tell you what I do know, that when I turn to the tables showing the facts I find this wonderful statement to be there: that for the last seven years under the contract system of printing for Congress, from 1853 to 1860, inclusive, the cost of printing for Congress was $5,200,000; the number of pages 361,000; cost per page, $1.76; labor, $2.75 per day. I find for seven years prior to 1878, and including 1878, this same printing cost $4,370,000, over $800,000 less than it did in the seven years I speak of under the contract system. I find further that there were 617,000 pages printed; that it cost seventy-five cents a page instead of $1.76. In other words, for the last seven years prior to the year 1878 you did over twice the public printing for $800,000 less money than you did it for the last seven years under the contract system, from 1853 to 1860. These are the facts and figures. I undertake to say it does not lie in the mouth of the other side with these facts staring them in the face to come here and talk about extravagance in the public printing.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I prefer not to yield; but, however, I will.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Just one word. The gentleman must recollect that in the Forty-fifth Congress an offer was made and a bill was introduced from the Committee on Printing, of which I was chairman, proposing to reduce the public printing $175,000, according to the estimates made by the Public Printer himself, and that when it was moved as an amendment Mr. Hale, on that side of the House, rose and objected to it as not being in order, and it was ruled out, so we were thus prevented from saving that amount of money to the Treasury. The gentleman cannot have forgotten that.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I was busy while the gentleman was making his statement and did not catch the drift of it, and hence will not attempt to answer it. I apprehend, whatever may have been the facts about the matter, the gentlemen seeking to place a rider on an appropriation bill to have it dragged through by the appropriation bill, or to have it drag the appropriation through, it was properly objected to. I do not recollect about the circumstances, however, so I cannot state anything about it. Nor is it material.

Before I leave this branch of the subject I desire to say a word about the constitutional power of the House of Representatives to elect a Public Printer. It may be that the House has the power to elect an officer who shall do the printing for the House; but I call attention to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. It proposes the House shall elect a Public Printer, and that Public Printer shall do the printing not only for the House but also for the Senate, and, in addition thereto, for all the Departments—the Army, the Navy, the Treasury Department, the Post-Office Department, including all blanks for postmasters, and for the State Department—in fact, all the printing of every kind that is done for the Government. Now, he would do more work for the Departments than he would for the House, and, to my mind, he is clearly such an officer as the Constitution contemplates should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, as provided by the latter clause of section 2, article 2, of the Constitution, which is as follows:

The President * * * shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, * * * and all other officers of the United States, &c.

The gentleman from Mississippi finds his authority in the last clause of section 2, article 1, for this amendment, as follows:

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers.

Now, if you can enact a law making a printer an officer of the House and empower him to do all the printing for the Government, then the name of the officer determines the power of the House and not his duties; and in this way you could by law elect officers for the House of Representatives and call them officers of the House and empower them to do some service for the House, and in addition act as marshals, ambassadors, &c., thereby rendering utterly null the power of the President to appoint the officers of the United States.

My friend from Mississippi believes in a strict construction of the Constitution, and that is one of the cardinal doctrines of the democratic party. It is wonderful how the chance of lifting a hungry democrat into office liberalizes the minds of our friends in construing the Constitution. They should amend their platforms so as to favor a strict construction of the Constitution, except when there is a chance to get office by a liberal construction thereof.

Mr. Chairman, I now proceed to the other clause in this appropriation bill which elicits discussion. It is as follows:

For payment of the fees and expenses of United States marshals and their general deputies earned during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, $600,000.

This appropriation is necessary on account of the refusal of the democracy to appropriate for these officers at the extra or special session, and they have been performing their duty since the 1st of July last without compensation. You will observe that the bill does not appropriate for special deputy marshals, a class of officers provided for by general law whose duty it is to assist in keeping the peace and to sustain the supervisors in preventing frauds at the election of members of Congress under certain conditions and restrictions; and, to use the words of the gentleman from Ohio in charge of this bill, "it," speaking of the Committee of Appropriations, "has failed or refused to appropriate any sum for special deputies."

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] in charge of the bill, speaking for his party, admits that the Supreme Court has lately decided that the United States election laws are constitutional which provide for the appointment and payment of these special deputy marshals, and then says "that, although that court has decided the constitutionality of the law, when we come as legislators to appropriate money, it is our duty to say: 'Is this law constitutional; or, if constitutional, is it a good law, and are we bound to appropriate money for it?'" The gentleman also announces the willingness of his party to assume the responsibility of refusing to appropriate money to carry out these election laws.

As to payment for the service of the special deputy marshals already performed the gentleman cites section 3679 of the Revised Statutes, which provides—

That no Department of the Government shall expend in any fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of appropriations—and says this section prohibits the creation of any claim against the United States for service of special deputy marshals at congressional elections, unless the money is appropriated prior to such service.

In reply I have to say this same argument would deny the claim of marshals and their general deputies for compensation, unless money is appropriated prior to the performance of services by them. Section 780, Revised Statutes, provides that the marshal "may appoint general deputy marshals," while section 2021, Revised Statutes, provides "whenever an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be chosen is held," &c., "the marshal, on application of two citizens, shall appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty shall be," &c. Observe, the power to appoint general deputies is permissive, while the command to appoint special deputies is mandatory. Yet we are told by the gentleman from Ohio that we are bound to pay for the service of the general deputies, and that the services of the special deputies are no claim against the United States. I will state, however, that section 3679 of Revised Statutes does not apply to the services of either general or special deputies. Neither of them are appointed by any Department of the Government, and do not come in the scope of the section 3679. Section 2022 provides that the marshal and his general and special deputies shall keep the peace, &c., at a congressional election, while section 2031 provides the pay of special deputies shall be $5 per day, while section 5521 provides that special deputy marshals for failure or refusal to perform their duties shall be subject to fine and imprisonment therefor.

The law is their warrant, and while that law remains unrepealed there is no power in the Government that can interfere with the performance of their duties, and the United States is bound for their payment; and this bill should be so amended as to pay all special deputy marshals for services heretofore performed.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to inquire as to the animus of the democratic party in refusing to appropriate money to enforce these laws. These laws have been in force since 1871. They are laws of the United States, under which, in elections for members of Congress, the powers of the United States can be invoked to secure a fair election. Without these laws, in the performance of the most important act affecting the interests of the United States, the United States would be wholly dependent upon the State laws. They were enacted under the leadership of the republican party. To secure their repeal the democracy forced the extra session. To the same end you proposed to withhold the necessary supplies to support the Government unless the President would assent to their repeal. Failing in the coercion of the President, you then appealed to the country, and in the elections last fall were rebuked by the people. You denied the constitutionality of these laws. The Supreme Court held them to be constitutional. Defeated by the people, and set down on by the Supreme Court, you announce through your leaders that your refusal to vote money to enforce these laws nullifies them, and then declare you will not vote the money.

In other words you cannot repeal the law without the approval of the President. But the House and Senate or either of them can refuse to appropriate and the law stands a dead letter on the statute-book, and then you ask the republicans and the people "What are you going to do about it?"

If these laws are fairly executed, and each freeman could deposit his ballot without intimidation and have it counted, you could not carry a solid South, and without a solid South you cannot elect a President.

The same is true as to New York. So by the proposed nullification of these laws you think you have nothing to lose and you may gain.

The cardinal doctrine of the ruling element in your party was and in spirit still is that the States may nullify a Federal law.

Secondly. That a State could secede at pleasure and thereby destroy the United States Government.

Thirdly. That the Federal Government was and is a mere creature of the States, without power to protect its citizens at home or perpetuate itself.

I grant you honesty of conviction and bravery in defense of those convictions. This only renders the situation more grave and perilous.

You were overcome but not convinced.

As the needle to the pole, so are you to your convictions when given power. For these doctrines you brought on the war, robbing the cradle and the grave, as you yourselves express it, in their defense. For these doctrines you opposed reconstruction. For these doctrines you opposed the constitutional amendments as a party both North and South.

Is there a man to-day who indorsed those doctrines and fought for them on the other side of the House that is willing to rise in his place and say that his convictions touching them are changed? For these doctrines you keep the South solid. For them thus you bulldoze and assassinate and proscribe and persecute. You glorify tissue ballots and clothe your magnificent manhood, which the world admired even in the defense of an unjust cause, in the garments of fraud and deceit. For them you commit frauds in New York, and sought to revolutionize Maine. And now under the lead of my supple colleague, Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Elections, you are ready to set the voice of the people at naught, and unseat WASHBURN of Minnesota, and seat his opponent, and ORTH of Indiana, and seat his opponent, and all that you may secure the votes of Minnesota and Indiana in the election of a President, in the event there is no election by the people, or if it suits your purpose not to count the electoral vote of a part of the States. You are ready to dare all things to come into possession of the Government.

The nullification of the Federal election laws is boldly avowed on this floor before the ink is hardly dry upon the record of the highest court in the land announcing their constitutionality, and all this to enable you to march over the highway of fraud to success. I have no hatred toward individual democrats. I would not wantonly wound the feelings of any man North or South; but I would protect every citizen everywhere in all his rights, including that highest of all privileges, the right to a free and untrammelled ballot and the right to have it counted. And when I see a great party deliberately refusing to enforce the law to insure a free ballot, I should be recreant if I did not cry aloud and spare not.

In conclusion I have to say the country views with alarm the prospect of the democratic party obtaining full control of the Government. From the very make-up of that party it cannot be trusted to guard and protect the results of the last twenty years, wrought under the lead of the republican party. Given the power, it would nullify the results of the war and make the Federal Government what it was twenty years ago—a mere thing without power to protect its citizens at home, and without force to perpetuate itself.

The spirit of the democratic party has its home not in the South alone, but as well in the North. It makes no difference whether it is the descendant of the Cavalier under the burning sun of the South, or the Puritan among the snow and ice of the North, the spirit of your party everywhere exerts the same fell influence upon men; under its lead fraud and force go hand in hand together to defeat the will of the majority. Republicans, the contest is upon us. It has already commenced; the notice in this debate and the action of the opposition upon this bill is a part of the contest. The fruits of the war and the progress made by the country under the theories and practice of the republican party are at stake. Let us acquit ourselves with energy and fidelity to principle and party. Let all minor differences as to who shall lead be accommodated. The majority in this as in all other cases should control. Victory waits upon us if we are worthy to receive her.

I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SPARKS. Will my colleague allow me to ask him what all of that has to do with this appropriation bill?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman; it will take but a minute, and I hope it will not come out of the time of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER.] In this bill is an appropriation to pay marshals and general deputy marshals only. And your leader from the Committee on Appropriations opened the debate upon this bill by giving notice that your side of the House would not submit to an amendment to appropriate money to enforce the election laws, Supreme Court or no Supreme Court.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BAKER. I cannot yield further.

Mr. SPARKS. My colleague discussed the election contest of Donnelly against Washburn. What has that to do with this bill?

Mr. BAKER. I cannot yield further. I believe since I came into Congress there have been some eighty-four investigating committees organized by the party in the majority here. Of these eighty-four committees, two have been trying during five years to investigate the condition of the Public Printing Office. We are now in the last year of the presidential term of the present incumbent, and another presidential election is just at hand. Failing to find anything as the result of five years of investigation that would justify the turning out of the Public Printer, and conscious of the fact (because I take it it is an admission of that consciousness) that they will be unable either to come into the Forty-seventh Congress with a majority or to elect a President through whose acts they could obtain the control of the Public Printing establishment, they now try in this Congress, for the sole purpose of obtaining spoils which they despair of being able to obtain by the consent of the people to be expressed at the ballot-box next fall—we find the democratic party without a single valid reason which has been established, urging the decapitation of the Public Printer and the election of a democrat in his place, for the sole and only purpose of giving some pickings to the hungry horde of political bummers and camp-followers who have come up here from all over the country and are besieging our democratic friends on the other side of the Chamber to give them place and position. As was stated the other day by the gentleman from Cincinnati, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH,] and I was not surprised at it because he stated the truth, the democratic party is "an embodied hunger and an organized appetite." We must expect that wherever by fair means or foul they can get hold of any official position that will give them some public plunder their hands will be reached out for that purpose.

It is not my purpose, however, to spend any time in the discussion of that matter. I come now to the second obnoxious feature of this bill, and on that I propose to submit some remarks.

Mr. Chairman, the item in this bill for the deficiency for pay of marshals looks to the nullification of the whole body of laws relating to the supervision of national elections, by a willful refusal to appropriate any money for their enforcement. It seeks to assassinate the whole of the election laws by a political rider. It provides only for the payment of marshals and their general deputies. It is thus worded to prevent the payment of any special deputy marshals for election purposes. With more courage at the extra session the attempt was openly made to repeal these laws on the ground that they were unconstitutional and were measures born of the hates of the war. The country was informed that they were grievances of so intolerable a nature that supplies necessary to the existence of the Government should be withheld until an unwilling Executive should assent to bills for their repeal. So impatient was the hot haste that it was declared that "he who dallies is a dastard and he who doubts is damned." Now it is sought to so frame an appropriation bill that special deputy marshals employed in the execution of the election laws shall be denied their fees for services which they have performed. If a special deputy marshal having a warrant arrests a criminal at the polls on election day charged with a violation of a national statute touching elections he is denied his lawful fees. Why this attempt to nullify the law by refusing to vote money to enforce it? It is far more courageous and manly to fight openly to repeal an obnoxious law than to seek covertly to nullify it by refusing to vote an appropriation. Gentlemen mistake the understanding and temper of the American people who think that nullification is more tolerable than open resistance. The country will not be deceived. It will attribute your abandonment of open resistance to cowardice, and not to a conviction that your policy was wrong and sprang from bad partisan motives. It will attribute the withdrawal of your steering committee from public sight to the sinister purpose of misleading the people as to the mischievous objects you have in view.

It is sought to justify this nullification of the election laws upon two grounds: first, because Congress does not possess the constitutional power to legislate for the supervision of the election of Representatives; second, because if Congress does possess such power no necessity exists for such legislation. I shall only speak on the first question. That Congress ought to possess such power is manifest from the consideration that the people in each district have a direct and immediate interest that there shall be a free and fair election in every other district in the United States. Every member here in a measure represents and makes law for the whole country. It therefore concerns every citizen that no member shall sit here and engage in laying taxes and shaping the future of this Republic who is not chosen by a pure and peaceable ballot. It would be a serious, if not a fatal, defect in our system if the General Government had no power to guarantee and protect the purity of our representation.

Since the Supreme Court has affirmed the constitutionality of these laws it is sought by the democratic press to poison the public mind by the claim that the decision is partisan; that it is contrary to the doctrine of the framers of the Constitution; and that it inaugurates a new and dangerous policy looking to the overthrow of the just powers of the States. In these insidious assaults upon the just authority of the judgment of the court the democracy follows the policy which it has pursued, both on the battle-field and in the forum, to destroy the nationality of the Government of the United States. It will be my purpose to show that the Constitution, as it came from the hands of its framers, gives to Congress full and complete power over the subject of the election of Representatives in Congress. In doing this I shall rely largely on the expressed opinions of those who framed and procured the adoption of the Constitution.

It has been argued that the legislation embodied in the Revised Statutes touching elections is unconstitutional on two grounds: first, because the Constitution does not prescribe the qualifications of electors, and hence that there are no national voters; and, second, because Congress has not the constitutional power to establish a system for the conduct of elections for Representatives. It must be conceded that if Congress has the power to make or alter all the regulations touching congressional elections, it must have the power to enact these provisions of the statute in controversy, as the greater includes the less. It will be my purpose to show that Congress possesses the power, whenever it chooses to exert it, to provide an entire electoral system for Representatives.

Under the Articles of Confederation the States had sole jurisdiction over the appointment of Representatives. They had the power, which was exerted by one of the States, to refuse to send Representatives to the Continental Congress. This was one of the seeds of dissolution existing under the confederacy which the framers of the Constitution undertook to remove. They undertook to form a more perfect Union, to establish a government of the people having within itself the power to perpetuate its own existence. They provided for the choice of Representatives by the people every two years, and prescribed who should be eligible as electors. The Constitution provides in article 1, section 2:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

This provision fixes definitely who are electors, and their qualifications. The several States have prescribed the qualifications of electors for the most numerous branch of their State Legislatures. They have thus invested certain persons with the right of suffrage for certain State purposes, while this right is denied to the residue of the people. But being made voters for State purposes, the Federal Constitution expressly invests them with other electoral rights of a national character, namely, the right to vote for Federal Representatives. Now, if the persons who are made voters by State constitutions and laws possessed the right by being voters in the State to vote for Representatives in Congress, then the framers of the Constitution are chargeable with folly in prescribing who should be electors for Representatives. If the fathers had not thought this provision of the Constitution conferred some new and additional right, what folly to place it in the Constitution. That the framers of the Constitution considered it important to provide who should be voters for Representatives in Congress is apparent from the language employed in No. LII of the Federalist:

The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government. It was incumbent on the convention, therefore, to define and establish this right in the Constitution. To have left it open for the occasional regulation of Congress would have been improper for the reason just mentioned. To have submitted it to the legislative discretion of the States would have been improper for the same reason, that it would have rendered too dependent on the State governments that branch of the Federal Government which ought to be dependent on the people alone.

Of what use would it be to "define and establish the right of suffrage" if Congress cannot protect the voter in its enjoyment?

The Federal Constitution having secured to the electors in the several States the right to vote for Representatives, Congress must have the power to guarantee and protect this right. The States are not required to enact laws and provide tribunals to enforce the rights conferred by and existing only under the Federal Constitution. The State governments are provided to protect and enforce State rights; while the Federal Government is established to protect national rights. But if it was a duty incumbent on the States to guarantee to each of its citizens the enjoyment of every right conferred by the Federal Constitution, still Congress would possess no method of compelling the States to secure this constitutional right to vote against denial or abridgment. It is contrary to sound principle to remit to the States the protection and enforcement of rights conferred by the Federal Constitution. It was upon this very rock that the Articles of Confederation so nearly made shipwreck of the Union. And notwithstanding the perils and solemn warnings of the past, the State-rights democrats of to-day would impel the nation on the same fatal rock. If Congress cannot guarantee and protect the citizen in the free and peaceable enjoyment of his constitutional right to vote, then the right is a mere glittering generality, dependent for its enjoyment upon the interests or passions of the party leaders controlling the States. Such is the modern doctrine of State rights—a doctrine which strikes a fatal blow at the power and supremacy of the nation. When the people of this country consent to surrender to the States the enforcement and protection of rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution, the dissolution of the Union cannot be long postponed. Those lately engaged in armed rebellion and their sympathizers are now employing the delusive cry of centralization to blind the people to the fatal tendency of the new State-rights conspiracy. The triumph of these doctrines under the specious guise of State rights and local self-government would be fatal alike to liberty and union. But the power of Congress to enact laws to protect and guarantee the rights secured by the Constitution is delegated to it expressly.

The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

These are not the only provisions of the Constitution conferring upon Congress the power to guarantee and protect the citizen in his right to vote for Representatives. The first clause of section 4, article I, of the Constitution confers this power. We copy it:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It has been strenuously argued that Congress cannot make or alter the regulations touching the times, places, and manner of conducting elections unless the States fail or refuse to make appropriate regulations therefor. This claim is shown to be indispensable both by the debates in convention on this clause of the Constitution and by the express language of the clause itself. The words "Congress may at any time by law make or alter regulations" touching the conduct of elections for Representatives are too clear and comprehensive to admit of doubt or debate. The power may be asserted by Congress at any time. Doubtless it was not contemplated that the power would be exerted by Congress unless an emergency arose which seemed to demand it. But Congress alone was made the judge at the time when and the extent to which it would legislate on this subject—whether it would provide exclusively for the election of Representatives, or exert only a portion of its power, leaving to the States a partial control of the elections.

It has been argued, too, that this clause of the Constitution does not confer upon Congress the power to enact a system of election laws to protect and guarantee to the citizen his right to vote and to provide the requisite officers and machinery to conduct the elections. By a specious process of reasoning it is sought to prove that if Congress can by its officers conduct elections for Representatives and protect and guarantee to the voter his right of suffrage, that Congress could also appoint officers to supervise the election of Senators by the State Legislatures. It is claimed that Congress could not provide officers to supervise the election of Senators, and that, by a parity of reasoning, it cannot provide for the supervision and conduct of the election of Representatives. There is, however, so little in common between an election by the people and by a legislative body that the same methods cannot be applied to each. The people cannot of their own authority hold an election; a legislative body can. Officers must be appointed, polling places prescribed, voting precincts established, boxes for ballots, poll-books, tally-sheets, returns, &c., provided before the people can participate in an election. The election officers must be clothed with power to pass on the qualifications of electors, as the body of the people have no power to do so. So also officers must be provided to protect the voters and the ballots. Without these and other things being provided in advance by the Government the people can hold no lawful election. But a State Legislature is a corporate body, having as an inseparable incident to its existence the exclusive power to determine who are its members and entitled to vote, and also to determine the methods of its own procedure. It possesses within itself and as a part of its own organism the means to protect itself against violence and fraud. It has as a part of its organism its own officers to receive, count, and declare its vote. If Congress should deprive a Legislature of its officers and substitute strangers in their place, it would cease to be an organized Legislature.

These considerations would seem to establish the conclusion that the constitutional provision, when applied to the election of Senators, does not and cannot have the same scope as when applied to the election of Representatives by the people. The scope of meaning to be given to a phrase or clause generally depends on the subject-matter to which it relates. As applied to the election of both Senators and Representatives, this clause of the Constitution was manifestly intended to confer on Congress so much power as was needful to enable it to provide for the election of Senators by the Legislature and of Representatives by the people. As it would destroy a Legislature to permit any other person or body than itself to determine who were to be its members or officers, it cannot be fairly argued that this clause of the Constitution confers any such power. It is alike fallacious to so construe this clause on the one hand as to enable Congress to destroy the State Legislatures, or to so construe it on the other hand as to deny to Congress the power to provide for an election by the people. Without spending further time on this line of discussion, I return to the real question, namely: Does this clause of the Constitution confer upon Congress the power to protect and enforce the right of the electors to vote for Representatives and to provide all the officers and appliances necessary to the full and complete enjoyment of this right? It seems plain that it was intended to confer on Congress the same power over the subject of elections as the States have. Such seems to me to be the obvious meaning of the provision. And that this is the true meaning is susceptible of proof in a variety of ways.

1. One of the mischiefs under the Articles of Confederation was that the States alone had the power to appoint Representatives in Congress. It was the avowed purpose of the framers of the Constitution to remedy this mischief by withdrawing this power from the States.

2. It is contrary to all sound policy to create a system of government and deny it the power to preserve its existence, or to make its existence depend upon the pleasure of its members. No government can safely intrust the sole power of choosing its officers to another and perhaps hostile government. I should long hesitate to attribute such folly to the wise and far-seeing men who laid the broad foundations of the Republic.

3. The testimony of the fathers on this subject is abundant and uniform. It all conduces to prove that they meant to clothe Congress with complete power over the whole subject of congressional elections. Madison, Hamilton, and Jay, all great names, certainly equal in learning and solidity of judgment to the State-rights politicians now in Congress, and having participated in framing the Constitution, knowing its intent and meaning better, all agree that the Constitution does invest Congress with complete power over this subject. The necessity and propriety of so doing is discussed in a powerful and luminous manner in No. LIX of the Federalist.

I proceed to make some extracts therefrom:

I am greatly mistaken if there be any article in the whole plan more completely defensible than this. Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

Again in the same number it is said:

Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government in the hands of the State Legislatures would leave the existence of the Union at their mercy. They could at any moment annihilate it by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs.

Again in the same number it is said:

If the State Legislatures were to be invested with an exclusive power of regulating these elections, every period of making them would be a delicate crisis in the national situation, which might issue in a dissolution of the Union, if the leaders of a few of the most influential States should have entered into a previous conspiracy to prevent an election.

The framers of the Constitution believed that they were giving Congress the power to provide for national elections when "the States should neglect to provide for the election of persons to administer its affairs" or when "the leaders of a few influential States had conspired to prevent an election." Neither neglect nor treason and conspiracy of the leaders of the States to prevent the election of persons to administer its affairs can annihilate the National Government. Why? Because Congress possesses the power, to quote the language of the Federalist, "to provide for the choice of persons to administer its (the nation's) affairs." The State-rights doctrine is that the States, and not the nation, possess this exclusive power. Such was not the doctrine of the fathers of the Republic. Threats have been made that supplies should not be voted unless the nation surrendered this great power without which the wise and patriotic men who formed the Constitution declared that "the existence of the Union would be entirely at the mercy of the States." The success of this doctrine means peaceable secession. It is fraught with more danger than the recent attempt to shoot the nation to death. War strikes at the nation's life in open day. No man can be deceived as to its meaning and purpose. Not so with the attempt to destroy the nationality of the Republic. The false and brazen clamor that the republicans favor centralization, Caesarism, and an empire, while the democracy seek only local self-government, may deceive and mislead some credulous but patriotic citizens. It will not deceive enough to enable its enemies to destroy the nation. This State-rights doctrine is a deadly poison, which, if it should penetrate the Constitution, would paralyze its powers and leave the Union to perish. This new conspiracy is more dangerous, because it is more insidious, than the treason and rebellion of 1861. By a different method it seeks the same object, namely, to prostrate the nation at the feet of the States. I warn the country against this dangerous dogma and against the men who uphold it. It is the last refuge from which the enemies of the Republic seek to annihilate the nation by sapping the foundation of its power.

A part of this conspiracy is the retention in the new code of rules of the power to put political riders on appropriation bills. The claim that this power is necessary in the interest of economy is shown to be a false pretense by the contest which went on for days to defeat any modification of the rules which would limit the right to change existing laws except as to amounts of money only. You still retain the power to coerce the Executive to approve obnoxious laws by placing them in appropriation bills. You still retain the power to degrade both the Senate and the Executive, as co-ordinate branches of the law-making power, by refusing appropriations except upon the condition of their agreeing to such provisions as you see fit to place upon appropriation bills. Your denial of power in the nation to protect the citizen in his rights as a voter at national elections, and your assertion of power to coerce the Executive under penalty of starving the Government to death, are simply new forms of the old treason which plunged the nation into the red sea of war.

I shall conclude what I have to say by quoting the opinions of the great and patriotic men whose matchless wisdom laid the foundations of the Republic. These opinions will, with their calm and sagacious reasons, overthrow the wicked dogmas of the modern democracy as to the power of the nation to control the election of members of Congress.

In the Virginia convention for ratifying the Constitution, on the 13th of June, 1788, the following occurred:

Mr. Monroe wished that the honorable gentleman who had been in the Federal convention would give information respecting the clause concerning elections. He wished to know why Congress had the ultimate control over the time, place, and manner of elections of Representatives, and the time and manner of that of Senators; and also why there was an exception as to the place of electing Senators.

Mr. Madison said: Mr. Chairman, the reason of the exception was that if Congress should fix the place of choosing the Senators it might compel the State Legislatures to elect them in a different place from that of their usual sessions, which would produce some inconvenience and was not necessary for the object of regulating the elections. But it was necessary to give the General Government a control over the time and manner of choosing the Senators to prevent its own dissolution. With respect to the other point, it was thought that the regulation of the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise.

This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly South Carolina, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government. It was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of this, in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And considering the State government and General Government as distinct bodies, acting in different and independent capacities for the people, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments the General Government might easily be dissolved.

In the debate in the national convention on the 9th of August, 1787, when the question of the method of electing Representatives in Congress was under consideration, the following occurred:

Mr. Madison and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out "each House" and to insert "the House of Representatives;" the right of the Legislatures to regulate the times and places, &c., in the election of Senators being involved in the right of appointing them; which was disagreed to.

A division of the question being called for, it was taken on the first part down to "but their provisions concerning," &c. The first part was agreed to nem. con.

Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Rutledge moved to strike out the remaining part, namely, "but their provisions concerning them may at any time be altered by the Legislature of the United States." The States they contended could and must be relied on in such cases.

Mr. GORHAM. It would be as improper to take this power from the National Legislature as to restrain the British Parliament from regulating the circumstances of elections, leaving this business to the counties themselves.

Mr. MADISON. The necessity of a general government supposes, that the State Legislatures will sometimes fail or refuse to consult the common interest at the expense of their local convenience or prejudices. The policy of referring the appointment of the House of Representatives to the people and not to the Legislatures of the States, supposes that the result will be somewhat influenced by the mode. This view of the question seems to decide that the Legislatures of the States ought not to have uncontrolled right of regulating the time, places, and manner of holding elections. It was impossible to foresee all the abuses that might be made of the discretionary power. Whether the electors should vote by ballot or à viva voce; should assemble at this place or at that place; should be divided into districts or all meet at one place; should all vote for all the Representatives, or all in a district vote for a number allotted to the district. These and many other points would depend on the Legislatures, and might materially affect the appointments. Whenever the State Legislatures had a favorite measure to carry, they would take care so to mold their regulations as to favor the candidates they wished to succeed. Besides, the inequality of the representation in the Legislatures of particular States would produce like inequality in their representation in the National Legislature, as it was presumable that the counties having the power in the former case would secure it to themselves in the latter. What danger could there be in giving a controlling power to the National Legislature? Of whom was it to consist? First, of a Senate to be chosen by the State Legislatures. If the latter, therefore, could be trusted, their Representatives could not be dangerous. Secondly, of Representatives elected by the same people who elect the State Legislatures. Surely, then, if confidence is due to the latter, it must be due to the former. It seemed as improper in principle, though it might be less inconvenient in practice, to give to the State Legislatures this great authority over the election of the Representatives of the people in the General Legislature, as it would be to give to the latter the like power over the election of their Representatives in the State Legislature.

Mr. KING. If this power be not given to the National Legislature, their right of judging of the returns of their members may be frustrated. No probability has been suggested of its being abused by them. Although this scheme of erecting the General Government on the State Legislatures has been fatal to the Federal establishment, it would seem as if many gentlemen still foster the dangerous idea.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris observed "that the States might make false returns and then make no provision for new elections."

Mr. Sherman did not know but it might be best to retain the clause, though he had himself sufficient confidence in the State Legislatures.

The motion of Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Rutledge did not prevail. The word "respectively" was inserted after the word "State."

On the motion of Mr. Read, the word "their" was struck out and "regulations in such cases" inserted in place of "provisions concerning them;" the clause then read, "but regulations in each of the foregoing cases may, at any time, be made or altered by the Legislature of the United States." This was meant to give the National Legislature a power not only to alter the provisions of the States, but to make regulations in case the States should fail or refuse altogether. Article 6, section 1, as thus amended—being now section 4 of article 1—was agreed to nem. con.

On the 21st of August, 1789, the constitutional amendments being under consideration in the House of Representatives, Mr. Burke, of South Carolina, said:

I move you, sir, to add to the articles of amendment the following:

"Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, or manner of holding elections of Senators or Representatives except when any State shall refuse or neglect or be unable by invasion or rebellion to make such election."

Mr. Ames said he thought this one of the most justifiable of all the powers of Congress. It was essential to a body representing the whole community that they should have power to regulate their own elections, in order to secure a representation from every part and prevent any improper regulations calculated to answer party purposes only. It is a solecism in politics to let others judge for them, and is a departure from the principles upon which the Constitution was founded.

Mr. MADISON. If this amendment had been proposed at any time, either in Committee of the Whole or separately in the House, I should not have objected to the discussion of it; but I cannot agree to delay the amendments now agreed upon by entering into the consideration of propositions not likely to obtain the consent of either two-thirds of this House or of three-fourths of the State Legislatures. I have considered this subject with some degree of attention, and, upon the whole, am inclined to think the Constitution stands very well as it is.

Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, said he hoped it would be agreed to; that eight States had expressed their desires on this head, and all of them wished the General Government to relinquish their control over the elections. The eight States he alluded to were New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

Mr. Carroll denied that Maryland had expressed the desire attributed to her.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS. The remark was not just as it respected Pennsylvania.

Mr. Sedgwick, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the motion by giving the power to Congress to alter the times, manner, and places of holding elections, provided the States made improper ones; for as much injury might result to the Union from improper regulations as from the neglect or refusal to make any. It is as much to be apprehended that the States may abuse their powers as that the United States may make an improper use of theirs.

Mr. Ames said that inadequate regulations were equally injurious as having none, and that such an amendment as was now proposed would alter the Constitution. It would vest the supreme authority in places where it was never contemplated.

Mr. Sherman observed that the convention were very unanimous in passing this clause; that it was an important provision, and if it was resigned it would tend to subvert the Government.

Mr. Madison was willing to make every amendment that was required by the States which did not tend to destroy the principles and the efficacy of the Constitution; he conceived that the proposed amendment would have that tendency; he was therefore opposed to it.

Mr. Tucker objected to Mr. Sedgwick's motion of amendment, because it had a tendency to defeat the object of the proposition brought forward by his colleague, [Mr. Burke.] The General Government would be the judge of inadequate or improper regulations; of consequence they might interfere in any or every law which the States might pass on that subject. He wished that the State Legislatures might be left to themselves to perform everything they were competent to without the guidance of Congress.

Mr. Goodhue hoped the amendment never would obtain. Rather than this amendment should take effect he would vote against all that had been agreed to. His greatest apprehensions were that the State governments would oppose and thwart the general one to such a degree as finally to overturn it. Now, to guard against this evil, he wished the Federal Government to possess every power necessary to its existence.

Mr. BURKE. I believe that many of those gentlemen who agreed to the ratification without amendments did it from principles of patriotism, but they knew at the same time that they parted with their liberties; yet they had such reliance on the virtue of a future Congress that they did not hesitate, expecting that they would be restored to them unimpaired as soon as the Government commenced its operations conformably to what was mutually understood at the sealing and delivering up of those instruments. It has been supposed that there is no danger to be apprehended from the General Government of an invasion of the rights of election. I will remind gentlemen of an instance in the government of Holland. The patriots in that country fought no less strenuously for that prize than the people of America; yet by giving to the States general powers not unlike those in this Constitution, their right of representation was abolished. That they once possessed it is certain, and that they made as much talk about its importance as we do; but now the right has ceased. All vacancies are filled by the men in power. It is our duty, therefore, to prevent our liberties from being fooled away in a similar manner.

Mr. Madison observed that it was the state governments in the seven united provinces which had assumed to themselves the power of filling vacancies, and not the general government; therefore the gentleman's application did not hold.

The question on Mr. Sedgwick's motion for amending Mr. Burke's proposition was lost. A vote was taken on Mr. Burke's motion by yeas and nays, which was rejected—yeas 23, nays 28.—Annals of Congress, vol. 1, pages 768 to 772, August 21, 1789.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD. I rise simply for the purpose of replying by facts and figures to what I consider the erroneous statements made the other day by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] and especially with reference to one or two items in his statement in which he made any approach whatever to specific charges in this controversy about the Government Printing Office. The result of all the inquiry that has been made, the result of every investigation, has been to show that the particular public officers who at this time are under fire, to wit, the Public Printer and the foreman of the bindery, Mr. Roberts, have not only not been found guilty of any dereliction of duty or departure from the strict line of rectitude in the administration of their respective offices, but they have displayed a prudence and an economy and a business tact in the administration of the affairs of that vast establishment which entitles them, instead of partisan criticism and scandal in this House, to the commendation and respect of the Representatives of the people. I say this because I find that in the only two instances in which anything like figures or facts are given, the charges against them have been totally disproved.

I will not now stop to allude to the charge against Mr. Roberts in regard to purchases of paper. That charge has been sufficiently met by my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and besides I have not time.

I come now to the matter of the wire-sewing machine, because I know where they are manufactured. The party who is at the head of that concern resides in my district; the store where they are sold is in the district of my colleague, [Mr. O'NEILL,] and the factory where they are made is also in his district. I say that in the purchase of these wire-sewing machines the Public Printer displayed a regard for the public interest and economy in the public service the absence of which would have shown him to be unfit for the position which he holds.

Now, what are the facts? The Public Printer's report, issued December 19, 1878, and covering the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, explains clearly the reasons for the introduction of the wire book-sewing machines. On page 15 it states as follows:

Nine book-sewing machines have also been put in operation, by which books are sewed with wire instead of thread, and at greatly reduced cost.

To ascertain the economy in their use a daily record is kept of the work done on each machine, and contrasted with the cost of hand-sewing.

The following table shows the saving made the week ending on the 21st of last month, being about the same as several previous weeks:

Number of machine.	Character of work.	Hours.	Number of books.	Signatures.	Average per hour.	Pay received.	Cost if done by hand.

Saving on the nine machines one week							99 00
Saving on the nine machines one week							416 98

Thus, in 52 weeks, there will be a saving of $21,632 over the old method, should the machines be constantly at work.

The saving is still greater in sewing larger books, such as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Revised Statutes.

The result on the last edition of the Revised Statutes, being 15,000 copies, is as follows:

If sewed by hand	$2,400
By the machines	300

At a saving of

In addition to this saving, the binding is more substantial than if done by the old method, as the book may be opened at any part without injury, which cannot be done when sewed with thread.

The edition of 300,000 volumes of the Agricultural Report if sewed—

By hand would amount to	$8,214
By the machines	2,220

An improved method of pressing sheets after being printed and folded, by which at least $5,000 per annum will be saved, has been adopted.

The foresight of the Public Printer is amply exemplified by the results. Since July, 1878, when these machines were first introduced, and covering the period of their experiment and trial, the total savings in favor of the machines over hand-work have amounted to $22,676.14—more than $1,000 per month for the whole time.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. WARD. I would like to do so.

Mr. FINLEY. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. WARD. I know that; and I would like to return the compliment.

Mr. FINLEY. Are you willing to do so?

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: if these machines have saved that amount of money in the current fiscal year, why is it that the Public Printer has increased the number of employees?

Mr. WARD. I know that there is an increase of work, as explained by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] Not only has the work of the extra session accumulated, but order after order, piled up almost mountain high, issues from this House to the Public Printer. We subject him to criticism and to penalties for not obeying our orders, and then condemn him for an honest effort to obey the directions we give him.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARD. I would like about five minutes more.

Mr. McMAHON. I must object to any further extension of time. The gentleman can print the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. WARD. I lost time by yielding to the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. FINLEY.]

Mr. FINLEY. I hope my colleague will withdraw his objection.

Mr. McMAHON. I tried my best to keep my colleague from interrupting. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARD. That is very hard to do. I do not wonder that the gentleman failed. I do not expect the gentleman from Ohio to succeed in that; but I do expect him to allow me to make up the time I lost in that way.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope my colleague will withdraw his objection.

Mr. McMAHON. Very well; let the gentleman go on for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no further objection.

Mr. WARD. The number of wire book-sewing machines now in use in the Government Printing Office is thirteen, introduced from time to time as their efficiency and economy became apparent, the last two very recently. The total cost of all these machines has been $20,000. And this remarkable economical result is exhibited, that these machines by their savings have paid for themselves in a few months, and the Government owns them absolutely "just as good as new."

During this fiscal year, to which the bill now under consideration applies, the capacity of these machines to "retrench expenditures" is manifested more clearly. The savings by months during this period have been as follows:

1879:

July	$1,176 43
August	1,586 45
September	1,086 17
October	1,580 30
November	1,460 59
December	2,604 42

1880:

January	1,887 73
February	1,833 07

During the above-named eight months the total expenditure for the wire-sewing machines was $6,500, for four purchased.

The Public Printer has followed the example and has been guided by the experience of other governments as well as private enterprise. In France and England the economical labor-saving qualities of these wire-sewing machines have introduced them into the public printing offices, and have found ready use in such extensive and carefully-managed private establishments as those of McKibbin, New York; Altemus & Co., Philadelphia; Becktold & Co., Saint Louis; Cox & Co., of Chicago; and Hart, of Harrisburg.

Hon. Theodore W. Burdick, of Iowa, who, as a member of the Committee on Public Expenditures, had fully examined this question, in a speech in this House, on February 27, 1879, which will be found in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, of March 5, 1879, said:

Another instance of charged extravagance on the part of the Public Printer rested on a purchase of certain wire book-sewing machines recently purchased for use in the Government Office from the manufacturers in Philadelphia. These are new machines and a new invention. Before making the purchase the prudence and caution of the Public Printer induced him to have set up in the office one of these machines and the same to be thoroughly tested and tried. After a thorough trial, the Public Printer becoming satisfied that the machine was labor-saving to an astonishing degree and completely successful, he ordered the purchase of nine machines at a cost of $1,500 each. This purchase has been fully investigated. The manufacturers from Philadelphia were called before the committee. The testimony, instead of establishing the fact that the purchase of these machines was a useless and extravagant expenditure of money, showed the fact to be that each of these machines would fully pay for itself in one year by the saving it would effect in the bindery department. This is not an exaggerated statement. The testimony taken confirms it.

A correct account of the work done on these machines since their purchase has been kept. This account shows not only the amount and kind of work done, but it also shows the name of the operator of each machine, the amount paid such operator, and it is easy to estimate what the same work would cost if done by hand.

An exhibit prepared and sworn to, covering the period from October 10, 1878, to January 1, 1879, shows that these nine wire book-sewing machines effected a saving to the Government during two and one-half months of over $3,500. This is such a striking example of apparent extravagance, yet of actual and great economy, that I ask attention to the testimony. The fact that $13,500 was paid for nine book-sewing machines for the bindery might lead to the inference that it was an unnecessary outlay, in that it seems a large expenditure. The result shows that they do the work of fifty hands, and should not be dispensed with for any consideration. The testimony further shows that the machines do better work than can be done by hand, are easily and successfully operated, and do all kinds of work.

The Public Printer acted wisely, for the best interest of the Government, and is fully justified in the purchase of this machinery.

Now, Mr. Chairman, such being the merits of these marvels of inventive ingenuity, these wonders of American mechanism, saving to the Government their cost in this short time and leaving the machines as good as new, the absolute property of the Government without royalty or license, I appeal to the House whether the Public Printer would not have been sleeping while the thunders of the progress of the age were rolling around him if he had failed to avail himself of those labor-saving contrivances? If he had so failed, would he not have been to-day open to our criticism and our just condemnation because he had not been alive to the movement of the times, and because he had kept his eyes shut to the value of machinery which would have worked economy to the Government? In other words, would he not have been guilty of extravagance by refusing to avail himself of the best means within his reach for saving the public money and curtailing expenses?

Mr. COBB addressed the committee. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I think I have the floor; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] yielded to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to understand to whom the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] yields the floor?

Mr. COBB. I thought I stated distinctly that I yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.]

Mr. FINLEY. I understood the gentleman to yield to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I have but a word to say in addition to what I have already said. Under the law, as it was read by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] at the beginning of each year the Public Printer is required to submit to the Joint Committee on Printing his estimate of the amount of paper that will be needed in his office for that fiscal year. The Joint Committee on Printing examines his estimates, and unless we know that there is something wrong about them—and we are not expected to know very much about it in fact—we direct him to advertise according to the law for bids for supplying that amount of paper for the year.

That was done at the beginning of this year. There were numerous bids sent in; I suppose twenty of them, perhaps fifty. The competition was very lively. After the bids were all opened and tabulated the Committee on Printing decided to whom of these parties the contracts for furnishing the paper should be awarded, giving them to the lowest bidders if there was no well-founded objection to their receiving them, such as the fact that any one of them had before furnished paper that was not suitable, or could not give proper security, &c. And after that we had nothing further to do with it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that you approved the purchase of paper to the full amount estimated for.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Yes, sir; whatever amount was estimated to be necessary the Joint Committee on Printing has always approved.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the Joint Committee on Printing have always recommended the call of the Public Printer for so much paper, and afterward indorsed the proposals and the purchase of that amount?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. No sir, we did not call upon him for any amount of paper at all; that matter was with him. We asked him to furnish an estimate of what would be necessary, but we specified no amount ourselves, for that is a matter with which we had nothing to do. He submitted his estimate, and upon that, as I have said, we ordered him to advertise for bids; and when these bids were put in and tabulated we awarded the contracts to the lowest bidders.

Mr. EINSTEIN. You are on the Joint Committee on Printing?

Mr. SINGLETON. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McMAHON. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4924) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DAVIS'S POLARIS NARRATIVE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in reference to the printing of an additional number of copies of Admiral Davis's Polaris Narrative; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

FUEL ALLOWANCE TO ARMY OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition for the repeal of the law in regard to the payment of officers of the Army for fuel; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENFORCEMENT OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the Secretary of the Treasury in reply to a resolution of the House of February 10, 1880, making inquiry for information tending to explain the necessity for the employment of armed men in the enforcement of the internal-revenue laws.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the communication, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF THE BATTLE ON GROTON HEIGHTS.

Mr. WAIT. I introduced yesterday a bill appropriating money for the centennial celebration of the battle of Groton Heights, Connecticut; and I also presented a memorial upon the same subject. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD as referring to a matter of national interest.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask to have printed a memorial or a bill?

Mr. WAIT. It is a memorial accompanied by a bill.

The SPEAKER. Which does the gentleman ask to have printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WAIT. I desire to have them both printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill, with the accompanying memorial, is as follows:

The Groton Heights centennial committee, appointed by the Groton Monument Association and the towns of Groton, New London, Ledyard, and Stonington, in the county of New London, State of Connecticut, beg leave to represent to the Congress of the United States—

That they are appointed to make arrangements for the commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the last great battle of the American Revolution, before the surrender of the British forces at Yorktown, which took place at Fort Griswold, in the town of Groton, Connecticut, on the 6th day of September, 1781, known in history as the battle of Groton Heights and the massacre of Fort Griswold.

That their organization for this purpose has been so far recognized and encouraged by the State of Connecticut as to be awarded an appropriation of $3,000 to aid in the proposed centennial commemoration.

That by additional appropriations and private subscriptions the committee hope to raise a sum sufficient to make the occasion worthy of our State and of the whole country,

That the massacre of Fort Griswold and the burning of New London and Groton were really occasioned by the Virginia campaign which resulted in the surrender of Cornwallis about six weeks afterward, as may be seen by the following correspondence of Sir Henry Clinton:

"On the 2d of September, while the American Army was marching through Philadelphia, Sir Henry Clinton sent a courier vessel to Yorktown with the following dispatch:

"Clinton to Cornwallis—in cipher—received 15th September.

"SEPTEMBER 2, 1781.

"Mr. Washington is moving an army to the southward with an appearance of haste, and gives out that he expects the co-operation of a considerable French armament. Your lordship, however, may be assured, that if this is the case, I shall either endeavor to reinforce the army under your command by all the means within the compass of my power, or make every possible diversion in your favor."—Carrington's Battles of the American Revolution, page 624.

And so it happened that a fleet of thirty-two vessels, under command of Brigadier-General Arnold, the traitor, set sail from New York on the afternoon of September 4, 1781, arrived off the harbor of New London on the morning of September 6th, landed in two divisions of eight hundred men each, one on either side of the river; that on the west side, under command of Arnold, burned the town of New London; that on the east side, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, attacked Fort Griswold, then in command of Colonel William Ledyard, with a garrison of one hundred and sixty men, mostly farmers hastily gathered from the surrounding country, and after a loss of about two hundred British regulars and their two highest officers, stormed and carried the fort by superior numbers, killed Colonel Ledyard with his own sword after his surrender, massacred almost the entire garrison, burned the village of Groton, and stole away under cover of night, not daring to encounter the fury of the then awakened country.

In view of the fact that the scene of this tragedy of the Revolution is the property and is now in possession of the United States Government, and that the event itself is a part of the great campaign which culminated in the surrender of Cornwallis, the committee respectfully represent that this monument and this centennial should share in the nationality which is to be accorded to Yorktown.

That the battle-field of Groton Heights belongs to and is the property of the United States, and the committee respectfully ask permission for the use thereof at such times as may be necessary for the centennial services. Being a national possession, in which respect it differs from most if not all others where centennials have taken place, the committee respectfully ask Congress to contribute a portion of the expense necessary to make it worthy of the nation.

That Groton Monument, a granite structure of hewn stone one hundred and twenty-seven feet in height, was built, adjoining the scene of the massacre in the years 1826-'30 by an association formed for that purpose and authorized by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, and the monument is still in charge of the Groton Monument Association.

That the monument needs repairs at the top, the sides and in the interior, and if not made soon it may crumble and decay. The stairway should be made safe and convenient, the outlook from the summit improved, and its general appearance, as it towers on the heights beside the thoroughfares by land and by water between New York and Boston, over which thousands are daily passing, should be made more in keeping with the event that it commemorates.

Therefore, the Groton Heights centennial committee respectfully ask the Congress of the United States to appropriate the sum of $5,000 for repairing and preserving the Groton Monument, and the sum of $5,000 to aid in the centennial commemoration at Fort Griswold on the 6th of September, A. D. 1881.

J. GEO. HARRIS, President,
JOHN J. COPP, Secretary,
And 36 others.

A bill (H. R. No. 5097) appropriating money toward the expense to be incurred in the centennial celebration of the battle on Groton Heights, and for other purposes.

Whereas the battle of Groton Heights was one of the closing events of the American Revolution, preceding the final surrender of the British forces at Yorktown, in Virginia, only one month and thirteen days, and is logically and historically connected with that great event; and

Whereas the State of Connecticut has already commenced preparations for the centennial celebration of this battle, the massacre attendant upon the capture of Fort Griswold, and the burning of New London, all scenes in the bloody drama of September 6, 1781; and

Whereas the people of the other States of the Union, proud of the part which their fathers took in achieving American Independence, and actuated by the feeling of a common brotherhood, must desire to unite with the people of Connecticut in paying a proper tribute to the patriotism, dauntless courage, and heroic sacrifice of the noble band of men who fought valiantly against superior numbers of British troops, and chose death rather than surrender their homes to the brutality and lust of the invaders: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the centennial committee of the Groton Monument Association, under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the purpose of aiding to defray the expenses which will be incurred in celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the battle and massacre at Fort Griswold, on Groton Heights, and the burning of New London, on the 6th day of September, 1781, in such manner as shall best fit the historical significance of that event, and be indicative of the present power, prosperity, and greatness of the United States as a nation.

SEC. 2. That the further sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of thoroughly repairing the granite monument erected in 1826 on Groton Heights, and to be disbursed under the direction of the Groton Monument Association.

SEC. 3. That the centennial committee of the Groton Monument Association are hereby authorized to enter upon and use the battle-field on Groton Heights at such times and in such manner as may be necessary for the centennial services.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to inquire of the gentleman who has charge of the bill which we have just been considering in Committee of the Whole how long this general debate is to run.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to state to the House that to-morrow, in moving to go into Committee of the Whole, I will also move to cut off debate—to limit it to five or ten minutes, or to one minute, so that we may proceed under the five-minutes rule. A pay-roll of at least $3,000 a day is dependent upon this bill; and I think we ought to pass it promptly.

Many MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. SPRINGER. I give notice that as soon as this bill is concluded I shall call up, and ask the House to consider, the contested-election case of Curtin vs. Yocum.

PENSION TO SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. DIBRELL, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to inform Congress by what authority the Commissioner of Pensions is withholding pensions allowed soldiers in the war of 1812 under the act of 9th of March, 1878, for moneys paid them under former acts of Congress.

Mr. DIBRELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5250) donating condemned cannon to the Fort Stephenson Park, Fremont, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

OBSTRUCTIONS AT DELAWARE BREAKWATER.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 246) construing an act approved January 23, 1880, for the removal of obstructions from the harbor at the Delaware breakwater; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 17, 1880.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

QUORUM.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is evidently no quorum present. The Chair will not proceed with the morning business until a quorum shall appear.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suggest that there be a call of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when Mr. WINDOM's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. WINDOM] I presume is engaged in his committee-room for a few moments, it is so near the hour of meeting. He will be here in a very few minutes, I am satisfied.

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll, and thirty-four Senators answered to their names.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was detained in committee-room, but was present in the Capitol, and am now present in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. GROVER] is detained at home on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have the same apology as my friend from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] I was detained in committee. I am now here.

Mr. BLAINE. I was in committee, also.

Mr. INGALLS. I have been detained at a meeting of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I was in committee, also, and am now here.

Mr. BLAIR. I was detained on business at one of the Departments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A quorum is now present, and business will proceed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, relative to the bill (H. R. No. 4928) to confirm the survey of the pueblo of San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of the representative committee of the Illinois yearly meeting of the Society of Friends, representing twelve hundred and sixty-one members, officially signed, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLAINE. I present the petition of Annie E. Gardiner, widow of John W. T. Gardiner, late a major on the retired list of the Army of the United States, praying to be paid for services rendered by her husband. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is purely a construction of the military law on which the claim arises.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH presented the petition of J. W. Burbridge & Co., during the late war residents of New Orleans, and Robert H. Montgomery, a British subject, praying to have their claim for the proceeds of sales of certain sugars alleged to have been taken by the officers of the United States, under the order of Major-General Butler, known as "General Orders, No. 91," at New Orleans, referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GROOME presented the petition of Samuel H. Johnson, late private Company K, First United States Colored Troops, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Jacob Kern and others, of New Oregon, New York, soldiers in the late war, praying to be paid the difference between the value of gold and greenbacks at the time they were paid for their services as soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 816) for the relief of Theodore F. Hartridge and William G. Christopher, sureties on the official bond of Felix G. Livingston, collector of customs at Fernandina, Florida, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War, in answer to Senate resolution of March 4, 1878, communicating information concerning the data from which the positions of troops were added to the Government maps of the battle of Gettysburg, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1490) to complete the survey of the Gettysburg battle-field, and to provide for the compilation and preservation of data showing the various positions and movements of troops at that battle, illustrated by diagrams.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 813) to amend section 1402 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the appointment of assistant naval constructors, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 918) for the relief of certain volunteer officers of the Navy, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of W. P. Burwell, praying compensation for certain tobacco lost and destroyed by the alleged wrongful and illegal action of the collector of customs at Richmond, Virginia, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There is no bill accompanying the petition?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that action be delayed on that case. There was a communication from the claimant which the committee did not have time to hear this morning, it having been presented just before the committee adjourned and after the meeting of the Senate. I should like action to be withheld.

Mr. McMILLAN. I withdraw the report then.

Mr. WITHERS. I was just going to move that the petition be recommitted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report is withdrawn.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 378) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Captain Lambert Wickes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 666) relating to the public lands of the United States, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 79) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and settle the accounts between the United States and the State of Florida, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2802) for the relief of the owner of the bark Grapeshot, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

ROGER A. PRYOR.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of Roger A. Pryor, formerly of Virginia, but now of New York, praying for the removal of his political disabilities, to report a bill for his relief. If there be no objection as it is a unanimous report, I believe, I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The bill (S. No. 1489) to remove the political disabilities of Roger A. Pryor, of New York, was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered at the present time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in favor thereof.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1491) for the relief of John Sammis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1492) to provide a permanent construction fund for the Navy, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ROLLINS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1493) to regulate the use and prevent the waste of Potomac water in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRUCE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1494) to incorporate the Washington and Great Falls Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1495) for the relief of homestead settlers on the public lands of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FARLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1496) to establish a dead-letter office at the city of San Francisco; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. McPHERSON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Commander George A. Stevens be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Mary Good be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. McDONALD. I move that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 1409) for the relief of James H. Woodard, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was misreferred, and ought to have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs in the first instance.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DENVER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar, commencing at the point reached yesterday.

The bill (S. No. 1269) for the erection of a public building at Denver, Colorado, was announced as being the first in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood that the bill was objected to by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] yesterday, and went over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. HARRIS. It was objected to by the Senator from Vermont just before the morning hour expired.

Mr. PADDOCK. It was not a formal objection, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont objected to it at that time, the morning hour having expired.

Mr. HARRIS. I asked the Senator from Vermont if I understood him as objecting to the bill, and if it went over, and he answered decidedly that he did. The Senator is not in his seat; and to end the question I now object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee, if he will permit me, that the principle involved in this bill is a very important one, and it ought to be settled now, because it relates to nearly every public building to be provided for at this session of Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say that the very reason assigned by the Senator from Florida is the one upon which I interpose the objection. It is just such a question as cannot be properly considered and properly debated under a five-minute rule.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, and others. There is no five-minute rule in regard to bills on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. If we are proceeding under the Anthony rule, I certainly understand that there is a five-minute limitation on debate, as is distinctly stated on the face of the Calendar.

Mr. CONKLING. If the honorable Senator will pardon me, that applies to appropriation bills and not to the Anthony rule.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the honorable Senator look at the Anthony rule at the beginning of the Calendar? It answers better than I can answer.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator makes pretty good answer.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought so.

Mr. CONKLING. I am clearly of that opinion, on reading the rule.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT MEMPHIS.

The bill (H. R. No. 2253) to provide for the construction of a marine hospital in the city of Memphis, Tennessee, was announced as being next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire what the jurisdiction between the State of Tennessee and the United States is to be touching the premises to be covered by the bill?

Mr. HARRIS. The bill itself will settle that question, I will state to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I am compelled to confess that to an apprehension so limited as mine, after the debate we have heard, the bill does not settle the question at all.

Mr. HARRIS. I say the bill must settle the question, or else it is settled by the general law upon the subject.

Mr. CONKLING. The bill preceding this provided for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building, not for a marine hospital but for other purposes as well known to the Constitution. That bill contained a provision touching jurisdiction. One of the Senators from Colorado moved to strike out that provision, which, as I understand it, would leave that upon a footing with this bill. Thereupon a debate ensued repeatedly in the Senate, Senators expressing very conflicting views as to the effect of the general law, and as to the propriety of that particular statute. Now comes a bill on all fours, as I understand, with that bill as it would be with the amendment pending prevailing, and it is proposed without objection to pass to its consideration. Seeing as I do, no distinction between the two bills, I do not understand why the one can be debated in the morning hour or under the five-minute rule, or voted upon, more intelligently than the other.

I do not wish to interpose an objection to this bill; I am not aiming at that; but it seems to me that, as a distinguished judge not very accurately as I think observed, "equality is equity," and although I am not a Senator from Colorado I can hardly see why it is that the Colorado bill should be laid aside involving exactly this question, and this bill passed as if there was no question about it.

Mr. HARRIS. I am quite ready to agree with the Senator from New York that this bill does involve the same question, but so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing for the Senator from New York to propose any amendment imposing any rule as to the question of jurisdiction within the territory occupied by this proposed building. I shall interpose no objection to any amendment fixing the jurisdiction within that territory. I am quite prepared to consent to any amendment the Senator from New York, or any other Senator, may propose in respect to that matter.

Mr. TELLER. It is apparent that if any such amendment should be proposed it would lead to the same discussion that has been going on with reference to the preceding bill, and therefore I object to the consideration of this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is objected to and goes over. The Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

ELEVATOR AT INDIANAPOLIS.

The bill (S. No. 1280) for the purpose of erecting an elevator in the United States courts and Federal offices at Indianapolis, Indiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $9,500 for the purpose of introducing an elevator into the United States courthouse and post-office, at Indianapolis, Indiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not opposed to the bill at all, but I should like in this connection to call the attention of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the value and desirability of having another elevator in the Senate wing of the Capitol, on the east side. If they shall consider it, I think they will be inclined to believe that it would be a very useful thing for all the committees of the Senate as well as for strangers coming to the ladies' gallery to have an elevator, for which there is a very appropriate place, in the eastern end of the Senate wing of the Capitol. Only calling their attention to it, I do not wish to delay this bill, but this is a good opportunity to say so. Then I should like to add that I hope if they recommend an elevator, that they will have it go in some other way than the saw-mill one that we now have.

Mr. KERNAN. I should like to inquire of some member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds whether there is any particular reason for having an elevator in this public building at Indianapolis, or is it to be the general policy to put elevators in the public buildings all over the United States?

Mr. MORRILL. In most of the public buildings that have been erected for many years past elevators have been put. This is a building that has been constructed at Indianapolis, and it is several stories high. An elevator is asked for by the judges and by various officers who are accommodated in the building, and it seems to be almost indispensable that it should be granted. The evidence before the committee was very full and complete that there is a necessity for it.

Mr. McDONALD. I will state that this building contains the post-office, the revenue office, the pension office, and two court-rooms for the district and circuit courts. All these accommodations are in this one building, and it is a very great inconvenience at present to have to go up and down the stairways as the officers there have to do.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The elevator would be used for everything there except for the post-office.

Mr. McDONALD. Except the post-office, of course. That is on the first floor, but all others have to go up the stairways. If any building needs accommodation of this kind, it is this one.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL LANDS IN COLORADO.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask the Senate to take up and dispose of a resolution I offered several days ago authorizing the Secretary of the Senate to appoint an assistant Senate librarian. It is a small matter, and I want it disposed of. I suppose there will be no objection to it.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will not ask that that be done until two or three more cases are gone through with on the Calendar.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the regular order on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 769) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands; which was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill is reported favorably from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see by the amendment reported by the committee that it involves quite a serious question, and it is one of those public measures that I think ought to give way to little personal claims. I think the bill had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is objected to and goes over.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator if he will let the bill be passed over informally. I do not desire to detain the Senate with it now, but I ask that it may go over informally, for there is great reason why the bill should be passed. The Senator can look at it in the mean time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the bill going over without prejudice?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it will be still subject to an objection when reached again, I shall not object to that course.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly. I merely wish the Senator to understand the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

SAMUEL I. GUSTIN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 549) for the relief of Samuel I. Gustin; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. By mistake the Committee on Claims reported back the wrong bill in this case. There were two bills for the relief of Mr. Gustin pending before that committee, and by an oversight the bill which the Clerk has in his hands was reported instead of Senate bill No. 1198. I move that Senate bill No. 1198 be substituted for the bill which the Clerk has just read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute will be reported.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do this so that Mr. Gustin may not be prejudiced.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Samuel I. Gustin the sum of $1,129 for supplies furnished by him under contract made with Government officials to the Army of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the report read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, February 12, 1880:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 549) for the relief of Samuel I. Gustin, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

This is a bill to pay Samuel I. Gustin for a quantity of wood used by United States troops near Macon, Georgia, in the year 1865.

General J. H. Wilson entered Macon, Georgia, on or about the 21st day of April, 1865, and on the 22d day of April, 1865, issued Special Field Orders No. 22, as follows:

"[Special Field Orders No. 22.]

"HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY CORPS,

"Macon, Georgia, April 22, 1865.

"It is hereby announced to the cavalry corps of the military division of the Mississippi that an armistice has been agreed upon between Lieutenant-General J. E. Johnston and Major-General W. T. Sherman, with a view to a final peace. The troops of the cavalry corps are ordered to refrain from further acts of hostility and depredations. Supplies of all kinds are to be contracted for, and foraging upon the country will be discontinued.

"The officers of the cavalry corps will enforce the strictest discipline in their commands. Guards will be established, private and public property respected, and everything done to secure good order.

"The brevet major-general commanding again takes just pleasure in commending the officers and men of the corps for their gallantry, steadiness, and endurance in battle and during the arduous marches to this place. He enjoins them to remember that the people in whose midst they are now stationed are their countrymen, and should be treated with magnanimity and forbearance, in hopes that, although the war which has just ended has been long and bloody, it may secure a lasting and happy peace to our beloved country.

"By command of Brevet Major-General Wilson.

"E. B. BEAUMONT,
"Major and A. A. G."

At the time Samuel I. Gustin had on his farm near Macon one hundred cords of wood. He also had a large amount of rails and other wood suitable for fuel. Between the 24th day of April and the 27th day of July 1865, it was used mostly by the troops for fuel.

About the same time, and after April 22, 1865, a building belonging to said Gustin was burned.

On the 27th day of July, 1865, Special Orders No. 3, Headquarters District of Columbia, were issued, appointing Lieutenant-Colonel J. H. Tompkins, Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry, and Captain John A. Roberts and Lieutenant George A. Patton, of the same regiment, a board to assess damages. This board called before it witnesses, both civil and military, and reported the amount due to Samuel I. Gustin as $2,529, which included $1,129 for the wood, rails, and other fuel used or destroyed by the United States troops, and $1,400 as the value of the said building destroyed. This report was made after not only taking testimony but personal examination by the board, and was approved by Brigadier-General John T. Croxton, in command. On account of lack of funds it was not paid by the quartermaster, and never has been paid. The board, in calculating the amount of $1,129, reduced all the fuel to cords, and calculated the amount due at the price at which the Army was purchasing similar fuel, at the time, under contracts.

The papers in this case were in 1867 sent to an attorney in Washington and lost, and have only within a short time been recovered.

"Proceedings of a board of survey held at Macon, Georgia, in obedience to the inclosed order.

"[Special Orders No. 3.—Extract.]

"HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,

"Macon, ———.

"II. A board of survey is hereby convened to examine into and assess damages sustained by citizens of this vicinity at the hands of United States troops. In each case the board will examine the premises carefully, take the testimony of witnesses, and report the nature of the damage fully; when possible, the troops committing the same, and whether the same was occasioned by the neglect or carelessness of the officers or was unavoidable.

"The board will be composed of the following officers, namely:

"Lieutenant-Colonel J. H. Tompkins, Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry.

"Captain John A. Roberts, Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry.

"Lieutenant George H. Patten, Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry.

"The board will convene at these headquarters at nine a. m. this morning.

"By command of Brigadier-General Croxton.

"W. A. SUTHERLAND,
"Captain and A. A. G."

"The board met pursuant to the above order. Present: Lieutenant-Colonel J. H. Tompkins, Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry; Captain John A. Roberts, Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry; Lieutenant George H. Patten, Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry.

"Samuel I. Gustin, (citizen,) being duly sworn, testifies that he has lost (or was destroyed) by United States troops the following property: Six hundred feet of fencing lumber, three thousand rails, one hundred cords of wood; also, one frame-building, with the machinery used for the manufacture of enameled cloth.

"Julius Peters, (citizen,) being duly sworn, testifies that the Fourth United States Cavalry made a road through Mr. Gustin's lands and destroyed a large quantity of rail-fencing from ten to twelve rails high.

"William Stinemetz, sergeant Company G, Fourth United States Cavalry, being duly sworn, testifies that since on or about the 24th day of April, 1865, the United States troops had been hauling wood from the lands of Mr. Gustin; has seen from four to six wagons hauling three or four days every week for two months; he is satisfied that over fifty cords of wood have been taken.

"Francis M. Seay, (citizen,) being duly sworn, testifies that on or about the 21st day of April, 1865, the enameled-cloth factory owned by Samuel I. Gustin, and valued at from $2,500 to $3,000, was burned by United States troops.

"Mrs. Francis M. Seay, being duly sworn, testifies that the enameled-cloth factory owned by Samuel I. Gustin was burned by Federal soldiers the day after General Wilson's command entered Macon.

"The board then proceeded to examine the premises, and, after carefully investigating the evidence, find that Samuel I. Gustin has been damaged by United States troops to the amount of $2,529, and that said damage was unavoidable, except the factory; and no evidence can be had as to what command the soldiers belonged to that destroyed it.

"J. H. TOMPKINS,

"Lieutenant-Colonel Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry.

"JOHN A. ROBERTS,

"Captain Company D, Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry.

"GEORGE H. PATTEN,

"First Lieutenant Company D, Fourth Mounted Kentucky Infantry."

"Approved.

"JNO. T. CROXTON,

"Brigadier-General Volunteers."

It does not appear that the enameled-cloth factory owned by Mr. Gustin and for which he asks compensation, was destroyed pursuant to the order of any competent military authority, nor that its destruction was necessary to facilitate military operations. It does not certainly appear that it was destroyed by soldiers. It is probable that its destruction was the wanton and unauthorized act of soldiers. The board of survey was not able to ascertain by what troops it was burned. We cannot recommend any payment to be made for the destruction of said factory.

Ought compensation to be made for the wood, lumber, and rails used or destroyed by the United States troops?

On the 23d of April, 1865, General Wilson issued the order, already quoted, in which he directed that "supplies of all kinds are to be contracted for, and foraging upon the country will be discontinued."

On the 24th of April, 1865, the United States troops began hauling wood from the lands of Mr. Gustin; and they continued to haul wood therefrom, with from four to six teams, three or four days every week for about two months.

It does not appear that all the lumber, rails, and wood for which Mr. Gustin claims were used by the troops for fuel or for any other purpose.

One witness testified that the "Fourth United States Cavalry made a road through Mr. Gustin's lands, and destroyed a large quantity of rail-fencing, from ten to twelve rails high."

It does not appear that any of the property was taken or destroyed pursuant to the order of any military officer.

The finding of the board of review was "that Samuel I. Gustin had been damaged by United States troops to the amount of $2,529, and that said damage was unavoidable, except the factory, and no evidence can be had as to what command the soldiers belonged to that destroyed the factory."

The items going to make up the aggregate of damages, $2,529, were for the factory $1,400, for rails, lumber, and wood, all reduced to cord-wood, $1,129.

It is a pretty close question as to whether compensation should be made for the wood. We certainly would not recommend it had it been taken prior to the date of the order of April 23, 1865, but as it was taken after the promulgation of that order, and nearly all was actually used by the Army, we have concluded to recommend its payment.

We therefore report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. CONKLING. Where was the theater of all this?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Macon, Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It seems to me that this is a pretty doubtful case, to say the least of it. I should like to know, in the first place, why it does not fall within the jurisdiction of the commissioners of claims, who were in existence since the 11th of May, 1872, and terminated, I think, on the 10th of March, 1880. Perhaps the Senator reporting the bill can tell us why the claim could not have been adjudicated by that commission?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The papers were sent by the claimant, Mr. Gustin, to an attorney in this city for the purpose of having the case prosecuted before that commission. The attorney was a member of a firm of attorneys. One of the attorneys constituting that firm, and who had the papers in his possession, died, and the papers were never found until within the last few months. It was for that reason that the case was not presented to the southern claims commission.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Did this claim fall within the jurisdiction of the southern claims commission?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think it did.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The reason why I asked the question is because there are a great many claims of this kind which have not been taken jurisdiction of by that commission, that are yet outstanding, and are very meritorious, and I did not know whether Congress could act upon them or not.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The claimant supposed the claim did fall within the jurisdiction of that commission and he intended to have it prosecuted before the commission but failed to have it presented to the commission for the reason that I have stated. The reason is that the attorney who had the papers in his possession died and the papers were not recovered until within a few months last past.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I spoke of 1872 as the time since which the commission of claims had been in existence. It was created by the act of 1871, I see, instead of 1872—March 3, 1871, which provided that a commission should be organized—

And whose duty it shall be to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims as shall be brought before them, of those citizens who remained loyal adherents to the cause and the Government of the United States during the war, for stores or supplies taken or furnished during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States.

So it is clear that this claim would fall within the jurisdiction of the southern claims commission if the person who claims for this damage had been a loyal adherent of the Government of the United States during the war. I do not see in the report—but very likely it is here somewhere—any statement that this gentleman was a loyal adherent of the Government of the United States. The Senator in charge of the bill can tell me whether the report contains anything on this subject or not.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, the committee did not pass on that question. There was evidence placed before the committee to show that he was a loyal adherent of the Government during the war, but the committee looked upon the case like this: General Wilson took possession of Macon on the 21st day of April, 1865. On the next day he issued the proclamation which is quoted at length in the report and which has been read by the Secretary, in which he says:

Supplies of all kinds are to be contracted for, and foraging upon the country will be discontinued.

The officers of the cavalry corps will enforce the strictest discipline in their commands. Guards will be established, private and public property respected, and everything done to secure good order.

Subsequent to the promulgation of that order, I think two days after the promulgation of the order, General Wilson's command commenced hauling wood from the land of Mr. Gustin, and that wood was used by the Army. Without regard to the question whether he was loyal or not, the committee were of the opinion that under the peculiar circumstances of this case he was entitled to be paid for the wood. He not only suffered loss from the destruction of his wood, but a building of his was burned. He asked compensation for that, but the committee found that they could not recommend that he be paid any compensation for the loss of that building. The committee state in the conclusion of their report:

It is a pretty close question as to whether compensation should be made for the wood. We certainly would not recommend it had it been taken prior to the date of the order of April 23, 1865, but as it was taken after the promulgation of that order, and nearly all was actually used by the Army, we have concluded to recommend its payment.

I have no doubt that if Mr. Gustin were a loyal adherent of the Government during the war, this claim would have been cognizable by the southern claims commission. Mr. Gustin understood that it was so cognizable. He forwarded the papers to an attorney in Washington and the papers were lost, as I have already stated. For that reason the claim was not presented to that commission. I agree with the committee that it is a pretty close case; but under the peculiar circumstances of the case the committee were of the opinion that he was fairly entitled to be compensated for this wood.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, the peculiar circumstances of the case are first that the committee is not able to find upon the evidence that this gentleman was a loyal adherent of the Government—

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, the committee does not find that he was.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. We do not pass on that question. It is hardly a correct statement to say that we were not able to find such a fact from the testimony, because we did not consider that question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, then it does not appear upon this report that this gentleman was an adherent of the United States. That I think is a correct statement.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is a correct statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The southern claims commission would have been obliged to try and decide the question whether he was a loyal adherent of the United States during the rebellion. This the committee avoid and do not find either way, so that we may assume for the purposes of this argument that he was not, because the Supreme Court of the United States in the days when they were thought to be more tender toward certain aspects of unpleasant affairs than some people suppose they are just now, held that every person residing within the rebellious territory was in point of public law and of public presumption engaged in hostility to the United States; and therefore in order to take a case out of that category affirmative proof must be made. Consequently, we must take it, for the purpose of deciding whether this claim shall be paid, that it does not make any difference whether this gentleman was on the side of the United States or was one of its enemies. Well, if the Senate is ready to take that ground—as very likely a majority of it is—very well; only we shall have it decided, because as the Senator from Florida says it covers a vast mass of cases of this character, the number nobody can count, and the class of cases of this character can be widened until the space between the Atlantic and the Pacific would hardly hold them. There is no doubt about that as to cases that were not brought before the southern claims commission for the reason that it was clear to those who had the claims that they could not prove the loyalty which was essential to their success; and there is also a vast class of cases that from one reason or another, where that question was open as here, were not presented. Here it is said the papers were lost. Well, it seems that enough evidence has been found readily accessible to get along with the loss of the papers. Why could not they have been found in order to present the case to the southern claims commission? Or was this gentleman so doubtful about his case that having sent it to an attorney in Washington and the papers being lost, he never took any more steps about it for the period of eight years?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think I said that the papers were lost and were only found within a few months past, too late to present the case to the southern claims commission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. Now, then, what were the papers that were lost? All the papers that we have here are first a copy of a field order issued by General Wilson. I think that the papers in the archives of the Adjutant-General's office in the War Department would have shown the existence of that order during all this period of time; and any person having an interest in the question could get access to it at any moment of time. The next order is a headquarters proceeding of a board of survey. That also unquestionably existed in the public papers of the War Department all the time. So I am not quite able to see what papers it is that were lost and have been found. These two that I have referred to are the only papers mentioned or stated in the report as ever having existed.

But that is merely on the question of diligence whether this is such a case of accidental misfortune in presenting the claim to a competent tribunal as warrants Congress itself in interfering after the period of presentation has gone by. So passing that, now what is the exact nature of this case as reported by the committee? The committee say, as it appears in this report, that after a severe struggle which made it proper for the general officer to compliment the conduct of his troops, Macon, Georgia, was occupied or captured, whatever you call it. They were in the country of the enemy. It was necessary that the troops should have fuel. The general officer in command directed that all supplies and forage should be contracted for. These were not contracted for, so that they do not fall within that. It was an order then against pillage. That was one part of it. It was in another part of it an order that supplies should be contracted for. These supplies, if they may be so called, as I say were not contracted; but apparently under proper military authority of some kind, immediately after this, the troops commenced hauling wood and rails from this man's farm to supply their camp-fires to cook their pork and boil their coffee.

Now, I will suppose that this gentleman had been down to that moment and was then an enemy of the United States. Is the United States going to foot bills of that kind? We have even held, through resistance in this Chamber and through vetoes of the President of the United States which were always sustained, that in a State that was always on the side of the Union where a citizen's property had been damaged by the operations of war he had no just claim even upon the Government for compensation; his loss was one of the misfortunes of a time of war and disturbance of that peculiar kind. Now here is a case where the armies of the United States occupying the country of the enemy after a severe battle, have to get rails and fuel, such as they can find in the neighborhood, to supply their camp-fires, and it is proposed that these shall be paid for. Of course this is a small claim in and of itself; I am only speaking of the principle of it. If this principle is right, we may as well begin to issue more bonds just as rapidly as possible to raise the money necessary because we cannot give this thing to this man and not give it to every other man who was similarly circumstanced.

It does not appear to me that the order directing that all supplies should be contracted for changes the situation at all, because these things not having been contracted for, that part of the order did not apply. Then the order was that these rails should not be taken without a contract; put that construction upon it, if you will; where are you then? You say that the rails were either taken after that order by a modification or construction of it by competent authority, or were taken by the soldiers of the Army without competent authority—a mere damage, a case of pillage so to speak—not pillage for the purpose of doing the man an injury, but the taking of what was within reach for the Army for the use of the soldiers in building their fires.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this involves a very wide field; and if we do it in this case of course we must do it in all. We cannot grant favors, if you call them favors, to one man and not to others upon any just principle of proceeding in this body. I think that this is one of those bills that will bear a little investigation, and that it had better go over unless somebody wishes to speak about it; if anybody does, of course I do not wish to object at this moment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that this report would be just on this ground; that if this had been a foreign war it would have been a duty the nation would have been bound in honor to make compensation under such circumstances.

Here was the case of an armistice. I have not before me at this moment the exact terms of the armistice between General Sherman and General Johnston, but undoubtedly it involved an engagement on the part of the generals of the two armies to desist from further acts of hostility against one another or against the territory which it was the object of the army under Johnston, certainly, to defend from acts of hostility. That army desisted from all offensive operations from that time, all acts of hostile force. In other words, the force which defended this man (supposing him not to have been a loyal citizen) against the Government of the United States desisted from his defense in consequence of the promise of the general commanding the Army of the United States that further hostile operations should cease with a view to a final peace. When the people of a city or a district submit in consequence of such a promise, especially a district which contains an army raised for the purpose of its defense, it seems to me that it is the duty of the Government to see that that promise is obeyed; and if it be violated by its military authorities, the citizen is ordinarily to be made good. I do not speak of such acts of wanton violence as cannot be prevented.

These supplies were taken for the use of the Army, the army under General Wilson, part of General Sherman's forces. Suppose the military authorities had contracted to compensate this man? If there had been a contract made and certified to, he would have been entitled to his pay, whether he was loyal or not loyal. The case is a little stronger, in my judgment, for a disloyal man under those circumstances because the honor of the Government was pledged to him by the circumstances. Here, after a proclamation on which the people of this district had submitted, after a convention made between the two forces that all hostilities should cease, late in the spring of 1865, the Army, for its necessities, took wood from this man's farm.

A board of officers were assembled, including Lieutenant-Colonel Tompkins and Captain Roberts and a lieutenant, who sat as a board to assess the value of what was taken, and a certificate was given that the Army had taken so much from this man's land. It seems to me he is entitled to it as much as if he had an express contract.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It was not my intention to offer any opposition to this bill in what I said a while ago. I merely wished to suggest that there were many cases like the one before us in this, that they were not brought to the consideration of the board designated by Congress to investigate them, for special reasons. Some of them, I think, were submitted to Congress and were not acted upon favorably. Now, Congress proposes to open the door for a large class of southern claims. This commission sat for years to investigate these claims, and it was provided by an act of Congress that they should be paid. I think that if a case presents itself now in which there are special equities showing that for no fault of the claimant his claim was not presented, it would be perfectly competent for Congress to afford him relief just as much as it was competent for Congress to provide for the large number that have already been paid. I think these claims rest upon a very different basis from that class the Senator from Vermont alluded to a while ago, because in them all I understand the element of loyalty is involved. He seems to think that by passing this bill all classes of claims will be opened up for consideration by Congress. In that I do not concur.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Vermont to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In a minute I will. I will not object until I say a word.

It is very far, I think, from being clear that the point made by my friend from Massachusetts is a sound one. I do not understand that an armistice prevents the troops in an enemy's country from being supplied off that country.

It is stated in the report that the reason why this claim was not paid was on account of a lack of funds. According to my recollection, it was found several years after 1865 that the amount of funds to the credit of the War Department for all these purposes of the war was still enormous, embracing millions upon millions of money, out of which payments were constantly made for all sorts of things; and it went to such an extent that long after this period, as late as 1868 or 1870 Congress passed an act turning into the Treasury that unexpended balance of war funds to the credit of the War Department, which then amounted to millions of dollars. I may be mistaken in that recollection; but it is worth looking up.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. All that the committee intended to say upon that point was that it appeared from the certificate of the quartermaster that he at that time did not have funds in his hands which he could use for the payment of this claim.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see that certificate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. We did not include all the evidence in our report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will allow us to see that certificate. I do not see that particular certificate, which might be important. I see that on a blank day there was a board of survey, not to inquire into this particular case apparently, but to examine into and assess the damages sustained by citizens in this vicinity at the hands of the United States troops. It is then stated that Gustin himself swore:

Samuel I. Gustin, (citizen,) being duly sworn, testifies that he has lost (or was destroyed) by United States troops the following property: six hundred feet of fencing lumber; three thousand rails; one hundred cords of wood; also, one frame building, with the machinery used for the manufacture of enameled cloth.

Julius Peters, (citizen,) being duly sworn, testifies that the Fourth United States Cavalry made a road through Mr. Gustin's lands and destroyed a large quantity of rail-fencing from ten to twelve rails high.

Is it possible that the existence of an armistice prevents the military power from rightly and lawfully building a road through anybody's property in the country that it occupies? Would that be a breach of the armistice even? But whether it would or not, has any private citizen a right to complain or to appeal for damages or compensation for what he has lost by a military road being built across his premises?

The next witness states:

William Steinmetz, sergeant Company G, Fourth United States Cavalry, being duly sworn, testifies that since on or about the 24th day of April, 1865, the United States troops had been hauling wood from the lands of Mr. Gustin; has seen from four to six wagons hauling three or four days every week for two months; he is satisfied that over fifty cords of wood have been taken.

The next statement is about the burning of the enameled-cloth factory which I pass over:

The board then proceeded to examine the premises, and, after carefully investigating the evidence, find that Samuel I. Gustin has been damaged by United States troops to the amount of $2,529, and that said damage was unavoidable, except the factory.

The factory the committee report against, if I correctly understand, so that we can leave that out. Thus the damage now proposed to be paid by this bill is reported by the board of survey as an unavoidable damage to the property of this citizen by these military operations. If that does not embrace the whole principle, I confess I am quite unable to understand what it is.

Now the bill may go over for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Why pass it over after we have had it discussed? Why not take the vote?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are several reasons. One is that I wish Senators to reflect upon it. I even wish the majority of the Senate to reflect on the question of the principle involved in this step. I am sure reflection will not hurt it.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from Vermont would allow this bill to pause a moment before it goes over. I wish to say a word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I trust the Senate will reflect upon the other point, which is, as it seems to me, not the one that has been discussed by the Senator from Vermont. I think there would be no report from the Committee on Claims, certainly not a unanimous one, in favor of any such doctrine as the Senator from Vermont has attacked. The point upon which this report rests is that these supplies were taken from a man dwelling in a district which had submitted itself, and whose military defenders had submitted themselves on the promise that the supplies taken after a certain time should be paid for.

The point on which this case rests, whether tenable or not, is this: whether in a district whose inhabitants had submitted themselves and whose military defenders had submitted themselves on a promise from the general in chief command in that district, authorized to bind the Government by such a promise by the rules of war, that all supplies taken after that time should be paid for, and should not be taken by force—whether a person from whose farm supplies were taken by the Army under such circumstances has a claim upon the honor of the Government for his pay. That is a serious question; that is the question. If the Senator from Vermont can satisfy the Senate that this case does not come within that principle, that is one thing. If he can satisfy the Senate that that principle is not sound, that is one thing. But he certainly does not help me in the discharge of my duties when he attacks the general policy of paying disloyal men for supplies taken for the support of the Army in the enemy's country when it was in rebellion. That is a different question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has stated a proposition of the public duty of keeping promises to which I should at first blush entirely agree; but unhappily for this case, so far as it is developed in this report, no such state of facts exists. It is not stated in the report that this man or any of his neighbors had submitted on a promise after the city had been captured, after what is stated in this report to have been such a battle as to require special thanks to the troops for the gallantry that they had displayed in it—

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to read the exact promise at some convenient time to him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, read it now.

Mr. HOAR. This has the signatures of General Sherman and General Johnston:

In general terms—the war to cease; a general amnesty, so far as the Executive of the United States can command, on condition of the disbandment of the Confederate armies, the distribution of the arms, and the resumption of peaceful pursuits by the officers and men hitherto composing said armies.

Then General Sherman publishes this order:

The general commanding announces to the Army a suspension of hostilities, and an agreement with General Johnston and high officials which, when formally ratified, will make peace from the Potomac to the Rio Grande.

Perhaps that does not bind the general or the subordinate to desist from taking supplies for the Army by force. I shall be glad to hear the Senator from Vermont on that question if he is willing to speak.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not spend much time in speaking about it now because this case is to go over and other cases are entitled to be heard. I was only speaking of what the report showed, and that was a statement by the commanding general at this place that an armistice had been agreed upon, and that affirmative operations would cease, and that future supplies would be contracted for. The same military authority proceeded, it is stated in this report in this case, not to contract for these supplies, if you call them supplies, but as the board of survey says, unavoidable damage was done by the Army to the premises and property of this gentleman.

Mr. HOAR. That the committee did not report any pay for. It is only the supplies that they propose to pay for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator is mistaken about that, because this "unavoidable damage" covers not only the destruction of the factory but the wood and the rails, &c., the $1,129, and the $1,400, and the something else, making $2,529 altogether. That includes the factory as well as the damage done to the farm. The board of survey say that this damage was unavoidable, but they say "except the factory," so that the "unavoidable damage" that the board of survey speak of is the very damage which the committee report shall be paid for.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The committee do not so understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the way it reads.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understand perfectly well how it reads, but it appeared that these rails, with this wood, were taken by the Army and used as fuel. It was necessary that the Army should have fuel, and in that sense the damage to Mr. Gustin was unavoidable—unavoidable for the reason that that perhaps was the only available fuel at that time. The Army was necessitated to have fuel. These rails were taken for fuel, and therefore it was unavoidable in that sense. It was not taken in a wanton spirit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In a wanton spirit.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But not destroyed wantonly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

COTTON CORDAGE IN THE NAVAL SERVICE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1281) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to introduce cotton cordage into the naval service; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to introduce into the naval service rope and cordage manufactured of cotton according to the process of Thomas W. Dunham, of Boston, to such an extent as will furnish a fair test of the value and efficiency thereof as compared with the kinds now in use.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a report with that bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I believe there is no written report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no written report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I propose an amendment that there shall be no claim on the part of this man against the Government at any time hereafter for royalty for the use of his process.

Mr. CONKLING. I will venture to ask of the Senator or of the committee reporting this bill why it is necessary by law to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to test the tensile strength of cotton fiber twisted into a rope—that is all this means—and its endurance against the weather? Is it possible that the Secretary of the Navy has not authority without a special law to ascertain whether cotton rope is strong enough and durable enough to enter into the rigging of ships, without an act of Congress requiring it to be done; and the test to be made of ropes subjected to the process of a particular named individual? I take it for granted there is some reason, and I shall be very glad to know it, as I am uninformed myself in regard to it.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, this bill not only authorizes but directs the Secretary of the Navy to introduce this cordage; and as the process of the gentleman named in the bill is claimed to have removed all the objections to cotton cordage which have heretofore been urged, it is proposed to secure for it a trial. If the result should be satisfactory when the test is made by the Secretary of the Navy it will add to the uses of cotton, which is largely produced by one section of our country, and therefore add to the value of that staple. As it will have a tendency to increase the consumption of that product it is only right that the Secretary should be authorized to take this step without involving the Government in any unnecessary expense.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend by striking out "and directed," in line 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I move to add to the bill:

Provided, however, That said Dunham shall have no claim whatever against the United States or any Department thereof, and shall receive no compensation on account thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill if the Secretary of the Navy is not already authorized under general laws to make such tests of cordage?

Mr. VANCE. I do not think there will be any necessity for the passage of the bill if the word "directed" is stricken out.

Mr. ALLISON. That is out now.

Mr. VANCE. I was not aware that it was out.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been stricken out on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

Mr. VANCE. I ask for a vote on that. I did not know any such amendment was adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question will be again put when the bill shall come into the Senate.

Mr. VANCE. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate concur in the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to strike out in line 3, after the word "authorized" the words "and directed"?

Mr. VANCE. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why we should compel the Secretary to do this? If he has authority, why does he refuse to do it? What is the necessity of forcing the Department to make this test?

Mr. VANCE. All I can say in reply to that is that the Secretary has been applied to, as I learn, to make this test, and he has not done so. If this word is stricken out he will probably continue not to do it and the whole object of the bill will be destroyed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 25,

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Having asked for the yeas and nays upon this question, I beg to occupy a moment in stating my reason for doing so and for voting for this amendment.

We listened yesterday to a brief but cogent dissertation from the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] touching the impropriety of wasting the time of the Senate and doing such things as he thought tended to the degradation of the Senate. I believe he employed that phrase. Now, I humbly submit that nothing could well fall more clearly within the class of occupation here denounced by the Senator than bills at the instigation or in the interest of particular patentees or owners of processes, directing, ordering the different Departments of the Government to take steps with a view to introducing a particular patented article. That is what this bill means. We all know that, with or without a general law, the Secretary of the Navy has authority to make this test; nobody denies that. It is within his discretion to do it; and as has been very frankly stated by the Senator from North Carolina the point of this proposed statute is to require him, to compel him, to order him to do it. Then what is to become of the interests and enterprises of all the other men in this vast country who have a process applicable to cotton to make it endure in all weather, or whatever the object of the process may be, and who have a process applicable to wood, to iron, to hemp, to flax, to all the other materials and productions, vegetable and otherwise, which enter into the economies of the nation? They are to come here too and ask for a bill directing a particular Department to make experiments and applications of the goods which they vend or the process which they own or the industry which they represent. I think that will hardly do.

As has been said, cotton is one of the great products of the country. A Secretary of the Navy would be blind indeed who needed to be told how desirable it would be to utilize cotton in cordage in the Navy; but if he does need to be told, he can be informed as he is of other things. He has full power and authority to make the examination, to apply the test, to ascertain its results, by means of the experts, of which he has a bevy around him in the employ of the Government; and this is a proposition to pick out this particular instance and order him to do that. Then, I submit, the Senate should entertain the idea of reviewing all the other processes which the Navy Department or the War Department or any other Department might properly test, pick them out one by one and direct what shall be done with them. I think it is improvident and unwise legislation. Therefore, I venture to ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business.

MOBILE BAY.

Mr. GORDON. Before the regular order is proceeded with, I should like to have an order made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will receive the proposition. On motion of Mr. GORDON, it was Ordered, That the letter of the Secretary of War in reference to Mobile Bay be transmitted to the House of Representatives for its consideration.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1194) for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MAIL-TRANSPORTATION DEFICIENCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, in section 1, line 21, after the word "service," to insert "or increase of trips;" so as to make the clause read:

During the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service or increase of trips on any postal star route shall be made.

Mr. BLAINE. I will not occupy three minutes. I merely want to restate the ground on which I shall vote not to concur with this amendment.

There has been some fault found and some scandal has arisen in regard to a few routes—I do not know how many there are; the chairman of the committee can tell me; but they are very few in number, whereas the entire number of star routes runs up toward eleven thousand. The injustice of this proposition is that pending an investigation into the irregularities or the frauds, if there be irregularities or frauds, of which I know nothing, in regard to eight or ten long routes, it is proposed here to suspend the ordinary, usual, admitted functions of the Post-Office Department respecting all the remainder of the eleven thousand star routes in the country for a period of three months next ensuing the passage of this bill. It strikes me that the legislation is uncalled for, that it is unjust, and that while, if there be irregularities or frauds in any of the routes, the power lies in the hands of the Government by withholding pay or other modes of prosecution to punish the offenders, the innocent in the other eleven thousand routes should not be made indiscriminately to suffer with the guilty and this amendment as proposed will make them do it. I shall vote against it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, the committee thought it best that the words "or increase of trips" should be added, because it is in keeping with the whole bill. It is well known that the Post-Office Department have exceeded their authority. I say that after thought. Whether they have exceeded the law or not, is another question; but I say they have gone beyond the proper discretion of any Department.

Mr. TELLER. That is what the Senator means, I suppose, in saying they have gone beyond their authority.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. If they have gone beyond their authority they have violated the law.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That has been argued a day or two, and I am sorry I referred to it, because I want to get the bill through without much further discussion, and therefore I will not answer my friend from Colorado on that point.

But if this amendment is not agreed to, we ought to increase the amount appropriated in the bill, for there is already a deficiency, according to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, of $1,720,004, when the Sixth Auditor tells us it is about $1,100,000. The committee and the Senate have passed upon an amendment appropriating $1,100,000, which we believe will carry out the service as it now stands; but if it is allowed to be increased, the probabilities are that we shall have a further deficiency; and is the Senate ready to say that the Postmaster-General shall go on and make these increases now, after having expended more than a million dollars in addition to what he asked for at the beginning of the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress? Is he to be allowed at his discretion to continue to make at the end of this year a still further deficiency? If not, we ought to agree with the committee in this amendment. If we agree that the Postmaster-General may go on and increase the routes in the same proportion, we shall have two or three hundred thousand dollars more of a deficiency at the end of the year.

Mr. PLUMB. The trouble about the action of the committee is this: They came in first with a preamble saying that the Postmaster-General had unwisely and unlawfully exercised his discretion, but I understand the committee has backed out from the preamble.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, sir; not backed out.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, I will not insist on the term. If the Senator can suggest any term that is more appropriate to describe the action of the committee, I will adopt it. At all events, it practically amounts to that. The committee abandon the assertion that these things have been unlawfully done; but still after all there is an insinuation made that they have been unlawfully done, and whether unlawful or not there is a statement that there has been a gross abuse of discretion. The trouble about it, as I said yesterday, without quarreling with this statement at all, is that the committee now ratify all that the Postmaster-General has so unwisely done and extravagantly done, and then sit down and say what? That the Postmaster-General shall not do it any more in reference to a certain class of routes where the necessity actually exists at the present moment. You ratify that which the committee say has been unwisely done; and then, for the purpose of effecting some little saving, you say he cannot do it in reference to a small class of routes where there is now a necessity for an increase of trips.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator whether he is now in favor of saying that the Postmaster-General did wrong, when his speech of yesterday was in the direction of encouraging the Postmaster-General and indorsing his action?

Mr. PLUMB. I am anxious to vote on this question, or the Senator from West Virginia would find out what I think about that. I object now to the committee making a scape-goat not of the parties on the routes wherein the extravagance has occurred but of the people on a class of routes where no extravagance has heretofore been exercised at all and from the very nature of things cannot be. The extravagance in all this service, if there be any, occurs in what is called the expedition. I am referring now to what the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said yesterday in reference to the striking out of the remainder of this paragraph covering the provision in regard to expediting mail routes. I will call his attention, as illustrating the cost of increase as compared with that of expedition, to one route which was referred to in the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] which was let at $6,000 a year for a once-a-week service. Of course by increasing the trips to daily that route gets $42,000 a year; but upon the increase of trips to seven times a week and the expedition combined the cost of the service went up to close to $140,000 a year, and I am not certain but above that, but at any rate near $150,000 a year. It is thus clear that the expedition costs three or four times as much as the increase of service costs. I do not say that that was not proper; I only speak of it to show that the increase of trips is not a branch of the service which involves extravagance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that that is a fair test, that because a trip once a week is agreed upon at $6,000 a year, if it is raised to twice a week the pay would be only $12,000?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does it fairly or reasonably follow that if the party is compelled to get more material to stock his route in order to make six trips a week rather than one, he can do it at the same rate that he did the other?

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that to be so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that that follows by any means.

Mr. PLUMB. If it takes one horse to carry the mail once a week, I do not see why two horses could not carry it in the same length of time twice a week; and I do not see why the second horse or the second man to ride him should not be furnished for the same price as the first. I do not understand that the practice of the Department is different from what I have stated at all. But when you come to add to the speed then you do add to the number of horses necessary to carry it on one trip or on two trips or more, as the case may be, and to the number of men necessary to ride them where they are ridden or to the number of coaches in which the mail is carried where it is carried in coaches. So the increase of trips, which has been inserted by the committee, is in reference to a class of service that is economical, comparatively speaking, and is not extravagant. All the trouble that has arisen under the large appropriations of money grows out of the expedition. I think, therefore, that the committee have commenced at the wrong end. For the purpose of saving money, for the purpose of setting their seal of condemnation upon the extravagance of the Post-Office Department, they now propose in the western section of the country that specimen of economy which comes just too late to be of service.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have said so much on this question that I will only say one word more. The difficulty is not in the increase of trips for the next three months. It is that whenever an increase of trips is made it extends practically to the end of the contract term.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask the Senator from Kentucky a question right there. Does not the committee provide in section 2 that as to all service which the Postmaster-General may hereafter create on new routes, he can expedite there as much as he pleases and increase by as many trips as he pleases? Why the distinction between the service which he is to put on this year as compared with that which he has put on in the year last past?

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Kansas will observe that we propose to declare that during the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service or increase of trips in any postal star route shall be made; so that the $100,000 given for new routes applies to what may be developed between now and the 1st of July as necessary for new service which will be let to the lowest bidder in open and fair competition.

The Senator from Kansas will also observe that one of the difficulties we have to contend with is that whenever a large number of new trips are added or expedition is granted the contractor comes and insists that good faith requires that that shall continue to the end of the contract term. Let me read for a moment what Mr. Salesbury, who is the largest contractor in the United States, said on that subject when the chairman of the sub-committee [Mr. WALLACE] put the question to him:

Question. In your letter you say something about the annulment of your contract after a month's notice; does your contract provide for that?

Answer. The contract provides that the Post-Office Department can annul any contract by giving a month's extra pay; but now, if you will let me state my case—

Q. Go on; we want you to state all there is about this. The committee want to hear your own statement about it.

A. Those of us who run such a great amount of mail certainly have some experience in business matters. The Government of the United States obliged us, when we bid for the contract, to give two sureties who own real estate, together with a certified check for 5 per cent. of the amount of our bids, conditioned that if the contract be awarded to us that we will execute a contract to perform the service for four years. Then when the contract is drawn it obliges us to give two more sureties to continue the contract four years. Now, then, what do we get from the Government? We have the good faith of our Government, of which we are a part. We have the long-accustomed usages of Congress that they will appropriate money each year to carry out these contracts for the term. We have the long-established usages of the Post-Office Department that they never do curtail these contracts or use the power which they have unless under extraordinary circumstances, such as building a railroad over certain lines or in a case where there is a mail service of once a week, for instance, on a slow schedule, and some man has that route who is not able or competent to put on the service that the Department and the Government require. Then they annul the contract and award it to some man who can do the work. That is the security that we have in return from the Government which justifies us in giving the heavy bonds that we do, and no business man would do it under any other conditions or under any other circumstances.

Q. Then I understand you to say that you do not regard the provision or regulation in the contract by which the contract can be annulled on one month's pay as a part of the contract?

A. That is what I understand, except under those peculiar circumstances which a contractor can always anticipate.

The meaning of all this is, and the complaint the contractors are making against the House bill is, "you gave us the expedition, required the extra service from weekly to daily; we have put on the needed stock; we have built the necessary stations; it is not fair to cut us down before the end of our contract time, because our bonds run for the four years." Everything runs for the four years; and they have had as much to do with the action of the committee as any other set of men, for there was justice in what they said. What do we here propose to say? As complaints are made, as an investigation is going on at the other end of the Capitol, we do not propose to cut down your present contracts, and we give $100,000 more to provide for new routes, as to which it is admitted the laws are obeyed; but as the Postmaster-General has said he desires to make changes, we declare that there shall be no more increase of trips, or expedition, or anything else for the next three months until we see if we cannot amend the laws so that this business can be carried out fairly.

Suppose in the next three months an increase of trips is ordered on a hundred or a thousand routes, every contractor will come to us and say "I have a right to go on for four years;" and what is the result, if we have mismanagement in the Department, which I have no doubt we have; there would be no investigation going on but for the very general belief that that is the fact. Now, after we have given them all the money they want, and seek to disturb no existing relation, why should we put this power in their hands to abuse it for four years to come without giving Congress a chance to say what ought to be done to prevent a repetition of that condition of things? If it only applied to three months it would be a very small matter; but the Senator from Kansas will readily see under the argument of the contractors that they would have a right to come in with another claim, as they are doing now, that gross injustice was done if any interference was had before the end of their contract term. Surely but little damage can be done in the next three months if we wait to see if new laws can be made or amendments to old ones secured that will make the Department conform more closely to what many of us think justice requires. That is all there is in our amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. There is a great deal of force in what the contractor testifying before the committee said about the disturbance of his contract after he had provided for the expense of carrying it out fully; but I know personally that the practice of the Department in regard to small contractors is not governed by considerations of that sort. I know that in my State a number of these contracts have been modified, some of them entirely abolished during the last twelve months. That became necessary, and the Department wisely exercised its discretion. In a great many other cases it has reduced the service from daily to semi-weekly, and in some from semi-weekly to weekly, by reason of the fact that railroads penetrated that section of the country, which changed the methods and manner of carrying the mails; but I have not heard of any contractor making complaint. It was part of his contract, it was part of his bond. He had no right to complain.

Of course the peculiar condition of things existing on the frontier is different. There men are required to have a large number of horses, to build stations, to dig wells, and to have other unusual appliances for carrying the mail, and they have a certain equity which for myself I am disposed to yield to. But I am speaking now of a class of men who do not contract with the Government in this way, a class of small contractors on short routes varying from 20 to 60 miles in length, where there has been heretofore no or practically no abuse—none that has ever been heard of—routes on which the Government spends only a small amount of money.

I called the attention of the Senate yesterday to the fact that the entire increase of service on star routes in my State last year was about $11,000, or less than $12,000, and I believe there has been no allegation made that in that case there has been any kind of abuse. I am speaking now about a class of people who are not served by the long routes, but have short routes where the Department has always exercised the discretion of cutting off the service entirely or increasing it at its will.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not think there is a very great deal of importance to be attached to the pending amendment of the committee, which the Senator from Kansas wishes to strike out. I apprehend that in the next three months there will not be any very great amount of increase of trips on established routes in the western country or in the older States. But the Committee on Appropriations having had to appropriate for deficiencies, have deemed it proper to put limitations and restrictions on the Postmaster-General as to his power to increase trips on existing routes or to expedite the routes; and I see no reason why the amendment proposed by the committee should not be adopted.

It has been regarded by the Senator from Kansas as a question affecting the Western States exclusively. It applies equally to the service in all the States of the Union, the older as well as the new. I do not apprehend that any very great amount of inconvenience will arise to the people in any section of the country in the next three months by their not being able to procure additional trips on any established route.

There has been considerable criticism of the Postmaster-General for the exercise of what he claims to be a discretion vested in him under the laws of the land. I have nothing to say against the Postmaster-General. I believe that he is an honest man, a man of integrity, and a man of character, and I have no criticism of him personally. I have a right, however, as a member of this body to express my opinion upon the question whether he has exercised wisely or unwisely the discretion which he considers to be vested in him by the statutes. I think the strongest argument against the exercise of that discretion is presented in the very bill which we are considering. At the last session of the last Congress we made an appropriation for the postal service based upon the estimates of the Department itself, and granted as I understand to the Post-Office Department all the money that was claimed or asked by the Postmaster-General for this particular service. Five million nine hundred thousand dollars was appropriated by Congress for what is usually termed star mail service; and yet we are met at the commencement of this session by a declaration of the Postmaster-General and his subordinates that the mails of the country will have to be stopped unless Congress comes up and gives them, according to one of the officials, $1,700,000, and according to this bill based on the estimate of another $1,100,000.

I apprehend there are but very few members of the Senate who have ever considered the existing state of circumstances but will be compelled to vote this money. We do not believe it to be right to stop the mails all over the country, as we are advised by the Postmaster-General will have to be done unless the money is appropriated; and, therefore, a demand is made upon us to vote the appropriation contained in this bill. To pass it is not a ratification of the action of the Postmaster-General, as is suggested by the Senator from Kansas; but we pass it because a necessity is laid upon us either to vote an appropriation of $1,100,000 for the postal service or to have the mails all over this country suspended. I repudiate the idea that we are ratifying the exercise of that discretion which is claimed to be lodged in the Postmaster-General by so voting. On the contrary, the expressions of opinion which have been heard in the Senate upon that question ought to exclude the idea that there is any disposition on the part of those who consider this an unusual exercise of discretion, or any purpose whatever on their part to ratify the exercise of this discretion by the Postmaster-General.

There is another question underlying this whole bill, and suggested rather by this condition of affairs: and that is whether the Executive Departments of this Government are or ought to be independent of Congress in reference to the expenditure of the public money. I listened yesterday to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] with a great deal of pleasure, as I always do, but it seemed to me that the logical consequence of the views which he presented was that notwithstanding we make appropriations for a particular service, if there is discretion vested in the head of a Department, especially in the Post-Office Department, in reference to the performance of the duties of the Department, he may disregard the expressed will of Congress evidenced in the appropriations made for that particular service and go on of his own pleasure, and without any restraint, to administer the affairs of the Department independent of the appropriations. I do not say that there is not a discretion vested by provisions of law in the Postmaster-General with reference to expediting the mail service; I do not say that there is not any discretion vested in him to increase the service upon a particular line; but I do hold that when Congress has spoken, when Congress has appropriated a particular amount of money for a particular service, then the Postmaster-General is not at liberty to withdraw his eyes from the appropriations made and go on carelessly, recklessly, or indifferent to the will expressed by Congress in its appropriations, and increase the service at his own pleasure upon old lines or to establish new lines if he pleases, so as to exhaust the appropriation which Congress has made for the service within six months or eight or ten months of the year, and then suspend the whole mail service of the country unless Congress chooses to come up or is forced to come up by his action and make further appropriations for it.

I say that in construing the laws which vest him with discretion in reference to these subjects, he is bound always to look at the action of Congress in providing for the service. It is an unwise exercise of discretion if he simply looks to the power and authority conferred upon him by former statutes without looking to the action of Congress in making appropriations for the service. I do not desire in the Senate to criticise the action of the Postmaster-General or the action of his Department, for which I do not hold him wholly responsible, because it is well known that the head of a Department cannot absolutely control all the details of the Department. He must rely on subordinates to a certain extent. I say that the action of that Department has compelled Congress to appropriate money that it did not desire to appropriate for the postal service, and this bill before us now is an exaction from this Congress by the head of one of the Departments of this Government.

We heard a few days ago from the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] a disquisition upon the deficiency bills which were brought in at every term. He alleged that the democrats of the House had curtailed the appropriations for the Government, and had been so meager and parsimonious in their appropriations that the Departments had to come here and ask for deficiencies. The case before us illustrates the cause of those deficiencies very frequently. It is a disregard by executive officers of the will of Congress in reference to the expenditure of money for any particular branch of the service; and many of the deficiency bills to which reference was made by the Senator from Minnesota the other day were caused doubtless by the very same cause that has produced this: a disregard on the part of the executive officers of the expressed will of Congress in its appropriation bills.

Mr. President, I am not willing that the Congress of the United States shall be placed at the mercy of executive officers in reference to the payment of money. It is our duty to vote the proper appropriations, not only for the postal service, but for every other Department of the Government; and we ought to hold a check upon the executive officers, and not permit them to exercise unwisely and recklessly any discretion which has been necessarily vested in them by the laws of the land. In voting, therefore, for this bill, I disclaim that I am to be understood by that act as ratifying, in the language of the Senator from Kansas, the action of the Postmaster-General or the exercise of discretion which has been vested in him. I do no such thing; I vote for it from the necessity which he has placed on us rather than see the mails of the country suspended for three months, or three months and a half.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the committee in this case. I do not see that there is anything in the arguments that have been urged here which meet the special point made by the Senator from Kansas that the necessities of the mail service of the West require upon routes already established an increase of trips and perhaps of expedition. That is a power conferred upon the Department, and it ought to be conferred upon some Department of the Government because it is necessary for the interests of the public service.

The Senator from Kentucky in his clear and able argument has raised a question, not as to the personal integrity, not as to the honest and patriotic purpose of the administration of this Department, but the very grave question whether a Department disbursing thirty or forty millions of public money annually shall be allowed to do it without any accuracy in its reports and estimates and without any control on the part of Congress as to what the amount of its expenditure shall be. He has presented the issue whether a Department of the Government is permitted under the existing law to make an estimate for a certain amount of money and exceed it by two million. On such a question thus stated there can be no just or proper difference of opinion. Beyond a doubt the great Departments of the Government, when appealed to furnish information as to the necessities of the public service in their Departments, must be held to some greater degree of accuracy than to come within two millions of the amount needed in a single year. There must be either an error of opinion or an error in the proper and economical administration of their Departments if they cannot do better. Without undertaking, therefore, to cast any degree of reflection upon those who administer the Post-Office Department, and conceding that there is nothing in this case to cast any reflection upon them except that there has been a grave mistake, a mistake which it concerns the proper administration of the Government to have rectified, I see myself in the laws as they stand that there is nothing to control the discretion of the Post-Office Department in this regard. The law is that they shall be required to accept the lowest bid on every route, however inadequate to the service to be performed, however unremunerative, however impossible to perform the service, and having accepted it, under the terms "expedition" and "increase of trips" they have a clear discretion to increase the compensation with an unlimited power to the contractor. This loose and absolute discretion in the disbursement of such a vast amount of the public money demands the application of a remedy; but does it follow from that that the interests of the public service in the great West, represented by Senators here who say to us that their people will be greatly injured by this restriction upon the increase of trips for the next three months, shall be jeopardized, that that injury shall be inflicted upon them? That is the special question presented by the amendment now pending.

In the discharge of my duties as a Senator I shall always pay a proper degree of respect and regard to Senators when they say that the interests of the public service in their States require that money shall be expended to a reasonable extent. I feel bound to give proper respect and deference to their wishes upon such a point. And while I concur in the absolute necessity of some legislation which shall make a law, where there is now none, to control the disbursement of one of the great Departments of the Government, I am entirely opposed to this amendment, and I see no connection between the necessity for our action and the infliction of a present injury for the next three months on those communities in the West where the routes demand an increase of the service. For that reason I shall vote against the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) Upon the pending amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 52; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The Chief Clerk read the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, which was, after the word "law," in section 2, line 4, to strike out the words "or increase the service upon existing routes other than those reduced by the first section of this act," and to insert in lieu thereof the following proviso:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite any contract either now existing or hereafter given to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per cent. upon the contract as originally let.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does "expedite any contract" mean in the amendment, I should like to inquire, as distinguished from expediting the service?

Mr. BECK. I suppose the committee meant "to expedite the service under any contract."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I think it would be well to say "service," because "expediting a contract" is a very serious thing to do.

Mr. MAXEY. I move to insert after "expedite" the words "the service on," so as to read "power to expedite the service on any contract."

Mr. BECK. Say "the service under."

Mr. MAXEY. I accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and that modification will be made.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to ask the Committee on Appropriations whether this proviso is intended to apply to the star service only, or to the mail service generally on railroads and steamboats as well?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It applies to all legally, I should say.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. My own impression is that the language would apply to all mail service.

Mr. BECK. The chairman of the sub-committee, who has charge of the bill, being absent, I will say that I think it was intended only to apply to the star service. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is absent this morning.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I wanted to learn whether the intention of the committee is that it shall be a continuing provision, and whether it is intended to apply to star service only, and if it were so intended why the distinction was made between the star service and railway and steamboat service.

Mr. EATON. I think I can make a suggestion to my friend that will render his criticism unnecessary. This provision must apply to the star service and nothing else. We should hardly give the Postmaster-General the power to increase 50 per cent. upon any of the great railroad routes of the country. We should hardly leave that with him. This gives him power to increase the routes to which the bill relates, to wit, the star service.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But I understand that the Postmaster-General has now the right to expedite the service upon mail routes over railroads, under all the contracts.

Mr. EATON. If he has I shall be glad that this provision is here, so that he shall not increase it more than a certain per cent. if he has that power.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What I want to come at is certainly in the provision. If it is intended to apply to all mail service, railway, steamboat, and star service alike, we ought to know it and express it. If it is intended to apply only to one kind of service, then I ask the committee to inform us of the reason why the distinction is made. That is the point I make.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will recollect that the railway mail service is regulated by law. On all the railroads the service shall not exceed so much per mile as to the space, weight of mail, and speed to some extent.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understand that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is an act regulating the transportation of mails upon the railroads, and this provision does not apply to railroads. Of course it may apply, but it was not intended to apply to railroads, because there is a law in existence which regulates them, and the Postmaster-General has to be governed by the law regulating the expense of the transportation of the mails by railway.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me a single moment?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. In the absence of the chairman of the sub-committee, who had charge of the bill, I suggest that the proviso should read thus:

That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract.

Then add the words "for mail service"— either now existing or hereafter given, to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per cent. upon the contract as originally let.

So as to make the meaning perfectly plain, whatever may be the effect of it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What does the Senator intend that to mean?

Mr. BECK. I desire it to apply only to the star routes.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator tell me why?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The law, I think, regulates the service on the railways.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think the law regulates some things, but not all things. It regulates the price to be paid for railway mail service according to the speed and the weight and space, but it leaves with the Postmaster-General the right to either decrease or increase the speed of railway mail service as well as star service. It leaves him the right to expedite the railway mails, and if he does expedite them it fixes the rate which shall be paid for the expedition. The power to expedite the one or the other is just the same, as I understand.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend will understand that there is a special appropriation (I have forgotten the amount now, but a few hundred thousand dollars) for special facilities for railroad mail service. The Postmaster-General has discretion, I believe, so far as that special appropriation is concerned, but to no greater extent than I recollect.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Do I understand the Senator from West Virginia to say that it is not competent for the Postmaster-General to increase the rate at which the mails shall be carried, say, from New York to Washington over the time now provided by existing contracts?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. He is governed by law as I understand it. There is a special law regulating the railway mail service.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. He is governed by the law as to what? As to whether he shall expedite the time or not?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, sir; I understand that everything connected with the railroad service is regulated by law. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] probably had something to do with the law and understands it better than I do. I will state that I am not very familiar with this bill, not having had it in charge. The chairman of the sub-committee who had the bill in charge is absent this morning, as the Senator from Kentucky has said. I think the Senator from Michigan is familiar with the law.

Mr. FERRY. What is the point?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the Senator from Michigan understands the question as to the mail service upon railroads better than I do myself, for I think I have heard him talk on it.

Mr. FERRY. As to the method of payment?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No; I will state the point to the Senator upon which I am seeking information. Here is a proviso that the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have power to expedite the service. The question I put is whether the language used is intended to confine that prohibition to star service only or whether it is to apply alike to star service, railroad service, and steamboat service. I am informed by the organ of the committee that they intended to apply it only to star service, and I ask the reason why the distinction is to be made; why, if the Postmaster-General has the right to expedite railway mail service, he may not have the right to expedite star service as well? I am answered that he has not that power now; that the power to expedite service upon railways is regulated wholly by law. My understanding of it is that the compensation is regulated by law, by weight and speed, but that it still remains competent for the Postmaster-General to change the time upon railway contracts as well as upon star service contracts.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Iowa is correct. In that respect the law is not changed. The bill that was passed last year did not change the existing law in that particular. The Postmaster-General is authorized, as well for the railroad and steamboat service as for the star service, to expedite the service; so that if the amendment should be adopted it would apply generally.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if this amendment is in the nature of general legislation to work a perpetual inhibition in respect of expediting the service, not only for the present year but for all the fiscal years that are to come hereafter? Is not that the object and scope of the amendment?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Nebraska addresses his question to the chairman of the committee. I would suggest that the Senator from Pennsylvania who had charge of this bill [Mr. WALLACE] is absent this morning. I am not so familiar with it as I would have been if I had had charge of it; but the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was on the sub-committee, and he understands the matter very well. However, I will answer the Senator's question as I understand it. The intention of the amendment, as I understand, is that the discretion which the Postmaster-General now claims is to be checked, a limit is to be put upon it, to the extent of 50 per cent. of the amount hereafter to be expedited; that the expedition shall not go beyond that.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is, then, in the nature of a general legislative enactment upon an appropriation bill, making this inhibition a perpetual inhibition in respect of this particular matter?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If it is a point of order that the Senator inquires about—

Mr. PADDOCK. It is a point of propriety rather than a point of order that I am speaking to, because we have heard the members of the committee say that there is an investigation proceeding, which is to continue until the end of the present fiscal year, in reference to all this matter, and they have provided that there shall be no increase of trips during the remainder of the present fiscal year. I suggest that it would be a logical thing to do, logical in reference to the position taken by the committee already in respect of increase of trips, that they should say that during the remainder of the current fiscal year there should be no expediting beyond the 50 per cent., and that any other attempt beyond that would be illogical and improper on such a bill as this.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. This bill is not in the nature, as the Senate has decided several times, of a general appropriation bill. In the consideration of one of the general appropriation bills not long since we had the question up whether or not a special bill of this kind could be termed a general appropriation bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. If that is true, my criticism has a better ground than it would otherwise have.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator that if that be true, then his criticism does not belong to this bill at all, because it is competent for the Senate to amend any bill, and the objection that could be made upon an appropriation bill as to the relevancy of an amendment would not apply to this, because this is in the nature of a general bill coming up. The Senator himself can move anything he deems proper to this bill, and if the Senate agree with him it will be in order, as I understand, to put it upon the bill. In connection with the public printing, for instance, as we understand the amount appropriated for that purpose is about exhausted, and perhaps within the next few days we shall neither have bills, nor Calendar, nor RECORD, the Committee on Appropriations propose to offer an amendment to this bill looking to an appropriation to temporarily carry on the Printing Office. If this were a general appropriation bill such an amendment might be objected to, probably, but it is not in that nature, as I understand.

Mr. PADDOCK. Does the Senator assume that general legislation upon a deficiency bill is more proper than it would be upon a general appropriation bill? I apprehend that that is a very untenable position.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. This is not a general deficiency bill; it is to provide for a special deficiency.

Mr. PADDOCK. For that very reason I think this general legislation is out of place; and I think in order to be in logical accord with the concluding portions of the first section the provision ought to be made to terminate at the end of the present fiscal year; that is, that the same phraseology in respect to the inhibition as to expediting the service ought to be used, that has been used in reference to the increase of trips.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Kentucky proposes to amend the proviso so that it shall read:

That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract for the star service either now existing or hereafter given, &c.

Is that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I am entirely satisfied that the bill in all its provisions applies only to the star routes, and this particular provision was intended only to apply to star routes. The present law will be found in section 3961 of the Revised Statutes. It is short, and I will read it:

No extra allowance shall be made for any increase of expedition in carrying the mail unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary, and in such case the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution.

As that section had led to what we thought great abuses, and as the Postmaster-General himself had recommended in his report that it should be altered and modified and the power under it curtailed, we intended in this proviso to say that the Postmaster-General shall not have the power to expedite the service on any contract on star routes either now existing or hereafter created at a rate exceeding 50 per cent. upon the contract as originally let, so as to avoid the trouble of that section. We did not believe that we were dealing with the railroad service or with the steamboat service—the steamboat service being very small, however—not supposing that the Postmaster-General in dealing with such a provision would try to make a train run five miles an hour faster or seek to control the trains. We were dealing with the expedition given on star routes, to which alone this bill relates. That is the idea of the committee, as I understand.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I was seeking for information, and sought to have the language made so plain that it would not cause trouble in construing it in the Post-Office Department. That I have succeeded in doing, if I understand the Senator from Kentucky to move to amend the proviso in the way indicated by me, confining it to the star service.

Mr. BECK. I shall therefore modify my amendment so as to make it as plain as I can, and move after the word "contract," in the seventh line, to insert the words "on star routes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "contract," in line 7, it is proposed to insert "on star routes;" so that the proviso will read:

That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract on star routes, either now existing or hereafter given, to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per cent. upon the contract as originally let.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then there will be no difficulty in construing the proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that amendment will be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We had better take a vote. It involves a great deal. I do not wish to be considered, for one, as consenting to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. EATON. I hope my friend from Kentucky will not press the amendment, because it interferes with the bill itself.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Allow me to finish my statement, and then I shall get out of the way.

Mr. EATON. I desire to say a word before my friend from Iowa finishes. The bill applies to star routes only. It has no reference to anything else. What is the title of the bill? It is "An act to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880." Everything that follows has absolute reference to star routes and to nothing else. Therefore, I say that is too clear and too plain to render it necessary to insert the words "star routes" on every other line of the bill. The bill has no reference to anything else, and cannot, unless by very forced construction, have reference to anything else.

Mr. BECK. One word. I will modify the amendment so far as to strike out the words "on star routes" after the word "contract;" which will leave the proviso simply in this form:

That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract, either now existing or hereafter given, to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per cent. upon the contract as originally let.

I agree with the Senator from Connecticut as to the meaning of it, that it can apply only to star routes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MAXEY. I only wish to say that the whole of this discussion is entirely unnecessary, because the slightest examination will show that chapter 10, beginning at section 3997 and ending at section 4005, covers especially railway mail service and contracts thereunder. The very wording of section 3961 shows that it refers to star contracts; and if the words "star service" were added to the proviso, it would necessarily carry with it the idea that as the prohibition extended to star routes the power existed as to other service, which is not the fact. Therefore, the words "star service" would injure the law rather than benefit it. I say to my friend the Senator from Kentucky and to the chairman of the committee, that it would be a dangerous thing to change the post-office law in that way. They have not got the right to expedite the service on railways now. This would by implication give it to them. But as the Senator from Kentucky has withdrawn his amendment, with the words "the service under" after the word "expedite" left in, the original amendment is, I think, in good shape.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I profess no particular knowledge of the rules of legal construction; but my recollection is that a subsequent law always changes a pre-existing law if the two are in conflict. The sections of the Revised Statutes cited by the Senator from Texas are not mentioned in this proviso at all; but there is a general, broad declaration that the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite any contract. I wish to ascertain what the purpose of the committee is, and if possible to have that purpose clearly stated, so that the Post-Office Department may not be involved in any difficulty in the construction of it hereafter.

The Senator from Connecticut states that the title of the bill will determine the question. Again I say I am very rusty in regard to the rules for the construction of statutes; but my impression is that the title of a law is not so authoritative as the language of the law itself, particularly where, as in acts of Congress, an act may cover half a dozen different subjects totally distinct from each other, if Congress so choose to enact.

Mr. EATON. My friend will permit me to say to him that the title of the bill is "An act to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes," &c. It refers to that and nothing else, and is as binding as any other part of the act. If there were other things in the act, it would say "and for other purposes," and then I should agree that it would be very proper for us to make the amendment.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The title of an act is usually the last thing settled, I understand. If we were to put in here a provision regulating the Territories, it would be competent to do so, and then to change the title in accordance with what we had done would be all right. What we may do with this title after we get through with the bill, we cannot tell yet. I was trying to construe the language as it is, to know what the language here meant, and I do say in the interest of the Department and of the public service, we ought not to leave it doubtful so that the Department may be embarrassed in giving a construction to it. If it is intended to be applicable solely to the star-route service, then I have only to say that so far as the State in which I live is concerned it will not affect us. We have railway communication in almost every county in our State; we have some star service there, but it is much less important. What the Senators from States not so highly favored in the way of railroads as we are may have to say about it, is for them and not for me to determine. I have done my duty in bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate, and I leave it with them to determine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as modified.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4 of section 2, after the word "law," it is proposed to strike out the words "or increase the service upon existing routes other than those reduced by the first section of this act," and to insert:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite the service under any contract, either now existing or hereafter given, to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per cent. upon the contract as originally let.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I desire to offer an amendment as an additional section to the bill. I move to insert at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated as aforesaid for the public printing, including the cost of printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it being a part of the deficiency for the current fiscal year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is understood by the Senate that the appropriation for printing is about exhausted, and probably by the end of this week we shall get neither bills nor RECORD unless some special provision is made for the Printing Office. Although the deficiency is much larger than $50,000, yet $50,000 it is believed will run the Printing Office to a certain extent until the regular deficiency bill, which is now pending in the other House, may come over and we shall have an opportunity of acting upon it. The committee believed it important to keep the Printing Office in running order at least, and if not doing all the work, doing the most important work until the regular deficiency bill may pass.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether we have had any response from the committee of the House which has that matter in charge? It suggests itself to me that while a bill is pending in the House to provide for a deficiency in the printing we ought not to meddle with that question, unless there has been some agreement between the respective committees of the two Houses to make an appropriation here on that subject, because we may attach to this bill an appropriation that will endanger its passage in the House. We are providing for a deficiency in the Post-Office Department, and we ought not to attach to this bill any measure which will delay its passage in the House for a single day under existing circumstances. If we now connect with it an appropriation to provide for a deficiency in the Printing Office we may put in jeopardy the very bill we have been providing for with reference to the Postal Department. I suggest to the Senator whether it is well to connect these two subjects together at present. I make the suggestion, not that I have any objection to a proper appropriation for the printing, if it is deemed advisable, but to call the attention of the committee to the difficulties that may embarrass this bill by adding the amendment proposed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is due to the Senator from Delaware that I should say that we have had no consultation with the House committee on this subject. I understand the general fact to be—and the bill is on our tables—that the House propose to appropriate $400,000 as a deficiency for the public printing, and they are now discussing that bill there. The Printing Office, I understand, asks for a larger sum than $400,000, although the House have not consented to give above $400,000. Believing that this bill will be much earlier passed and become a law than the bill now pending in the House, this $50,000 is proposed to be added by your committee, believing that it will relieve the Printing Office from the present embarrassment. I should say to my friend from Delaware that if the committee of the House objects to the amendment they will refuse to agree to it, and in conference it will go out; but if the House committee believe it is wise and proper, of course it will remain. The Senate Committee on Appropriations believed it far better to add such an amendment here, thinking that probably this bill will be a week or two earlier in its passage than the other.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill which we have been considering for the last two or three days is one of very great importance to the country. There are radical differences of opinion in regard to this bill between the Senate and the House, which probably may throw it into conference. Those who desire the bill to pass as it has been amended so far by the Senate do not want it cumbered down or handicapped by anything that may probably delay or endanger its passage. I have no objection in the world to the amendment offered by the committee in and of itself; I think the chairman is right about it, because there is danger of stopping necessary printing. At the same time I do not want to put this amendment on the bill if there is any danger whatever of thereby endangering or delaying the passage of the bill into a law.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I approve very heartily of the proposition which has emanated from the Committee on Appropriations in the offering of this amendment to this temporary deficiency bill. I would state to the Senate that unless some action is taken very soon by the two Houses of Congress we shall have an entire stoppage of everything at the Printing Office. The Public Printer has already been compelled to furlough a large body of the employés. He has been compelled to stop work upon many of the books and documents which were being printed at that office under the order of Congress and to devote all the means that he can rake and scrape toward paying for the work upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which we cannot possibly do without. A cessation of the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would certainly work the greatest inconvenience to the members of the two Houses in discharging their public duties. It is possible, as I have been informed by the Public Printer, that he may get through this week with the RECORD with the means that he has at his disposal to pay for the work, devoting it all in that direction; but if an appropriation is longer delayed he will have to stop; it will be absolutely impossible for him to continue to furnish the RECORD to us each morning as we require it.

The House Appropriations Committee has reported a deficiency bill, which includes $400,000 for the public printing; but there are other measures connected with that bill which have given rise to great dispute. The result is that that bill "drags its slow length along," and there is no knowing when it may come from the other House into the Senate. It is therefore all-important to us that we shall provide some temporary means, by way of a deficiency of the character proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, to carry on the work on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD until the larger deficiency bill comes from the other House. It is all-important—I submit it to Senators for their own convenience—that if they do not put an appropriation of this character upon this bill now they may find themselves on Monday morning next without any RECORD to inform them of what has been going on in the other House on the preceding Saturday.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator from Maryland, if he will pardon me, that I have just had a conversation with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. As I stated before, I am in favor of this amendment. The only trouble I had was the fear that it might endanger the bill. I am quite sure, from what the chairman says to me, that there will be no danger of endangering the bill in which we are all—I, at least, am—so much interested. Therefore I shall not make any objection whatever to the amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. Then, if there is no objection to it, of course I shall not weary the Senate by any further discussion.

Mr. MAXEY. I am satisfied from what the chairman has said to me that there will be no trouble.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Texas rightly represents the conversation that took place between us. Both the Post-Office and printing appropriations are very important, and I do not think one ought to drag down the other. I am of the impression that they will help each other, and that this bill will become a law in a day or two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is an amendment which I offered yesterday which if adopted will supersede the preamble. I offered it by direction of the committee. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia proposes to amend the bill as follows:

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add:

SEC. 4. Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed as a ratification of any unlawful act or omission of any officer of the United States, or affect any proceedings therefor.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Appropriations seem determined that the Senate shall present a bill of indictment against somebody in the passage of this act. Before voting upon this amendment I should be glad to have the chairman inform the Senate at whom this section is aimed, and what are the acts and omissions that are complained of, and who the parties are who are sought to be in this way covertly assailed. If the section is not aimed at somebody, it is useless. If it is aimed at the Postmaster-General, I believe it to be unjust. I should be very glad before being called upon to vote on it to know exactly what the purpose of the section is, who is sought to be affected by it, and what the meaning of it is.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Kansas has addressed his question to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The Senator probably overlooked the fact that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] now has the bill in charge, in the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE], who was chairman of the sub-committee. Therefore I will hand the question over to my friend from Kentucky, who will answer the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that the Committee on Appropriations are willing to make this trade with the Senate: if the Senate will agree to pass this section, then the Committee on Appropriations will omit asking any action upon the preamble. That is, if they cannot succeed in putting fangs in the head of the bill, they want to put a sting in the tail of it; for I suppose this means the same thing as the preamble.

Mr. BECK. I will answer the Senator. I am in favor of the preamble to the bill. I have spent a good deal of time in the last two days in endeavoring to show that the Postmaster-General and his Department have violated the law in spending money in excess of appropriations and in making contracts in excess thereof, and that in addition to that they have kept back facts which they ought to have told the committee when they asked for more money, and that there has been bad administration even when they were within the law. I may not have satisfied any other Senator but myself that that is the case, but I have endeavored to show that it is true. The Committee on Appropriations, however, determined that they preferred to have this section offered to the Senate in lieu of the preamble. The Senate can vote it down if they do not like it, and they can vote down the preamble if they do not like it. The country will understand whether the charges I have made against the action of the Post-Office Department are true or not. The laws are given, the conduct is admitted; and while the Senator from Kansas may think it is all right, and while he may approve it all, I am equally conscientious in disapproving it all, and I have given the reasons for so doing. That is all there is of that.

Mr. INGALLS. Then this section is intended—

Mr. BECK. This proposed section is the act of the Committee on Appropriations as a substitute for the preamble that I advocated.

Mr. INGALLS. And is intended to accomplish the same object—that is to say, the condemnation of the Postmaster-General for acts alleged to have been in violation of law?

Mr. BECK. It is intended to do just what upon its face it purports to do. I think he ought to be condemned, and his whole Department ought to be condemned. I think unless Congress is going to turn over all power over appropriations to the Executive Department, it is time we were condemning somebody. If the Postmaster-

General can stop all the mails of the country by an executive order and force us, under duress, to give him all the money he asks for or close the mails on 10,400 routes, it is time that something was said.

While I understand that the section proposed does not make any accusation against the Postmaster-General, it does say that this appropriation shall not relieve him of, nor is it intended to be an excuse for, any act of his that may be proved to have been illegal. There is a committee of investigation at the other end of the Capitol, as the Senator knows, which is looking into all these things. That committee believe that gross frauds have been practiced. They are now investigating them. We do not intend to pass this bill, sent to us from the House of Representatives, in such a form that the Postmaster-General or his advocates can go to the world and say that all the accusations at the other end of the Capitol are false. We give the money without any such suggestion; we leave that question open. If they ascertain in their investigation that frauds have been perpetrated, let them act; we say nothing about the consequence or the fact; we have avoided it altogether, so far as any suggestion of fraud is concerned. There being an investigation going on, we do not intend to pass the bill without saying that we leave all questions open that are now being investigated by the House.

That is all, as I understand it, that the committee desire to say in this amendment. If there is guilt and the committee of the House ascertain it, there is nothing in this bill to preclude action. The Senate is uncommitted. That was the argument before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. It may be right. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] very well said that perhaps the preamble as originally reported contained an accusation of guilt, and if any officer of the Department came before us for trial the Senate might have by this preamble expressed an opinion beforehand. I saw and felt the force of that. I do not intend to express any opinion beforehand in regard to matters that are being investigated, and we thought we had carefully avoided it and contented ourselves by stating in the preamble the simple fact that the law had been violated.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if the amendment now proposed is not an indirect implication that the Postmaster-General has violated the law, thus expressing an indirect opinion in advance?

Mr. BECK. It may be; but I would not do it by any indirection at all if I had my way; I know he has violated the law. The statutes said that he should not expend more money than we gave him. He has done it; he admits it.

Mr. FERRY. That may be the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky, and he seeks now to obtain an opinion of the Senate in accord with his own; but I take issue with him.

Mr. BECK. This is no expression of opinion here as to the action of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. WHYTE. It is a reservation.

Mr. BECK. It is a reservation of an opinion that we may give one way or the other after the facts are ascertained. It is saying that we will not anticipate the action of the House and declare that the investigation going on there has no foundation before that investigation is closed or its proceedings are made public. We give the money and reserve our opinion.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky, who is a lawyer, if this bill should pass without either the preamble or this amendment, and any proceedings were taken against the Postmaster-General, does he expect that that officer could plead this in his defense? Did anybody ever hear of such a proposition, that by the simple payment of money we declare that an offense against the law is condoned? In the first place, we cannot do it if we would. I think such a statement is unheard of in any body.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment. I move to amend by inserting after the word "ratification" the words "or condemnation," and also to strike out the word "unlawful." The Secretary will please read the amendment as it would stand if amended as I suggest.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "ratification" it is proposed to insert "or condemnation," and to strike out the word "unlawful;" so as to read:

Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed as a ratification or condemnation of any act or omission of any officer of the United States, or affect any proceedings therefor.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let the Secretary read that again; I think probably we can accept it.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment as proposed by Mr. KIRKWOOD.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to ask why put that in if it is not to have a bit of meaning either way? You are careful to put that in and then to insert that it shall not be construed to have any possible significance in any possible direction; but you insert it. It shall not be understood to ratify anything or confirm anything, or deny anything or assert anything, but still we must have it in. That is the way it strikes me. I submit to my honorable friend, whom I am always so glad to follow, that we have got a clean bill if you leave all that out.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the bill will be cleaner and make some hands cleaner with it in. I think, as I catch it, that we accept the amendment on the part of the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am not in favor of that amendment. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, in my opinion, is to assert affirmatively that we approve of this exercise of discretion on the part of the Postmaster-General which has involved the Government in the expenditure of $1,100,000. I am not in favor of it. I do not want to condemn the Postmaster-General unheard, but I am not here without knowing all the facts in this case to say that I approve or condemn. I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to leave out the whole section, but I am not willing by my vote to say that I approve of all that he has done.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator certainly misunderstands the force of the amendment offered by myself.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That may be.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The amendment moved by myself, if passed, will say we neither approve nor condemn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Any act that is done?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Any act that is done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The exercise of the discretion whereby he has involved the Government in an expenditure of $1,100,000 I do condemn; and while I am willing to vote to provide for it, I do condemn, so far as my judgment is concerned, the exercise of that discretion on the part of the Postmaster-General. I am not willing, by my vote, to say here that I do not condemn it, because I do in my honest judgment believe that it was an unwise exercise of the discretion vested in one of the heads of the Executive Departments. I am willing to vote the money to provide for the deficiency which the exercise of his discretion has caused, but I am not willing to say by my vote here that I approve of the exercise of that discretion which has brought this trouble upon us. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think my friend from Delaware misunderstands—

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, I do not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. He says he does not. Then I have nothing more to say in that direction. I think as the amendment now stands, so far as this act is concerned, it does not ratify nor does it condemn. The very intention of it is that if proceedings should be had elsewhere this act shall not affect those proceedings, and we say that it shall not affect those proceedings.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is precisely the effect if my amendment be adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It seems to me that the amendment is a very sensible one. I understand this to be an appropriation for a deficiency created by the action of the Postmaster-General under the circumstances stated in this debate, and an implication of approval of his action might be drawn from the appropriation. The position of the Senator from West Virginia I think is clearly right. The object of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is to do away with any imaginary implication which might be drawn either way from making this deficiency appropriation. It is neither an approbation nor a condemnation. There are no words of approval in it. It simply says we appropriate this money to supply a deficiency made necessary by the action of the Post-Office Department, which is undergoing investigation. The amendment says that by this appropriation we do not intend either to condemn or approve the action of the Department; that is it.

Mr. INGALLS. Would there be any ratification or condemnation if this section were not in?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There might be by implication.

Mr. BLAINE. But very remote. I think my friend will see that it is hardly necessary for the Senate to put itself in an attitude—I do not know exactly how to characterize it, but in an attitude which is in a slight degree laughable. We have had a long debate here over the appropriation of $1,100,000, made necessary because we did not appropriate enough in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BLAINE. That is all there is about it. It is simply because we did not appropriate enough money in the regular appropriation bill last year to carry out the regular estimates of the Post-Office Department; and now lest somebody should feel himself concluded, or excluded, or precluded, or deluded, we must put in something to assure the whole world that we do not ratify anything that has been done and we do not condemn anything that has been done! I submit to everybody on both sides of the Chamber that that is not a large-sized piece of legislation for the Senate of the United States to engage in, and the best thing we can do is to avoid such grotesque expressions as that and let the bill go. Let it have no more meaning than just this—"it hath this extent, no more"—that we are voting $1,100,000 to carry on the postal service of the United States. That is all there is in it.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maine is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and of course is assumed to know what the facts are. Instead of not voting enough in the regular appropriation bill, we voted every dollar that the Postmaster-General and his Department said was necessary for the service.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; but they did not know.

Mr. BECK. They did not know how much they intended to give away for expedition and for routes not then provided for. They determined, therefore, to disobey Congress and to spend a million and a half or two million dollars more than they asked for; and now the Senator from Maine comes and says it is grotesque in us to tell the Postmaster-General, "although you have done that, although you are under investigation now, we will not put a caveat in this bill to show that we are going to await the result of that investigation and see whether we will condemn or approve, and in the mean time withhold our opinion, giving the money asked for; although it was caused by the Post-Office Department expending more than Congress appropriated, although Congress gave you all that you asked."

Mr. FERRY. I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he has not guarded sufficiently against a repetition of that by the amendments which have been adopted by the Senate?

Mr. BECK. We have guarded against it in the future as far as we thought we could.

Mr. FERRY. Then why ask for the expression that is now pending? Why compel Senators to vote upon a proposition upon which there is a difference of opinion? The Senator from Kentucky takes one side; I take the other. He condemns the Postmaster-General; I do not. Here is a proposition to imply indirectly that the Postmaster-General has done wrong. I am not prepared to vote for that.

Mr. BECK. The Committee on Appropriations did not go so far as I did in reference to expressing an opinion, but simply reserved the question. What I wanted they did not care to vote upon, or perhaps they did not think it proper to vote upon, and as I said I confess when the Senator from Arkansas made his remarks yesterday I doubted somewhat the propriety of voting upon the preamble. This is an effort on the part of the committee to avoid that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I thought that was accepted.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the amendment was accepted.

Mr. FERRY. That was accepted.

Mr. CONKLING. Nobody has power to accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that objection was made; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. By unanimous consent it can be accepted.

Mr. BLAINE. Who moved the amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BLAINE. But who moved the amendment to which this amendment is to be attached?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BLAINE. He has perfect power to modify it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAINE. Was the original amendment reported from the committee?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was reported by a majority of the committee. The Senator from Maine was not in this morning.

Mr. BLAINE. I remember now; I beg pardon. I was mistaken; but it was not a committee amendment that was considered in the session of the committee. It was one of those amendments to which we agree by passing around the hat. The Senator is right, but we had not an opportunity to consider that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Is my amendment still pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is still pending. The question is on agreeing to that amendment to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think I had better call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHYTE. Let us take the vote by a division.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest to my friend to be content with a division.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Let us take a division. I do not wish to be compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. EATON. We might as well have the yeas and nays. If we are to have as foolish a thing as this put in the bill, I want it done on a call of the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Allison,	Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Paddock,
Anthony,	Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt,
Baldwin,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Plumb,
Blaine,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Blair,	Garland,	McMillan,	Saunders.
Booth,	Hamlin,	Maxey,	Teller,
Burnside,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Whyte.

NAYS—34.

Bailey,	Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Bayard,	Edmunds,	Kernan,	Vance,
Beck,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Vest,
Call,	Groome,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker,
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Williams,
Conkling,	Hereford,	Pryor,	Withers.
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—14.

Bruce,	Grover,	Logan,	Wallace,
Butler,	Hill of Colorado,	Randolph,	Windom.
Carpenter,	Hill of Georgia,	Sharon,
Farley,	Lamar,	Thurman,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill as an additional section the following:

Sec. 4. Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed as a ratification of any unlawful act or omission of any officer of the United States, or affect any proceedings therefor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it must be apparent to everybody that that is the merest buncombe, if I may use the term without being offensive. It is not possible by any vote of ours to ratify any act of that kind, and we certainly are not charged with the power under the condition of affairs here presented to pass condemnation upon any of these acts. The Senate has not yet resolved itself into a body to try an impeachment. While it may in fact say, and does say, that we do not condemn anybody, yet the declaration is put there for the express purpose and the avowed purpose, as stated by one Senator, of showing that we disapprove of the action of the Post-Office Department. That may not be technically and strictly a violation of our constitutional authority; but nevertheless it amounts to that in principle. It is a declaration that we have tried this man and found him, so far as the public is concerned, wanting. It is purposely done for that. Senators may cover it up as they see fit, it is intended as a condemnation and a thrust at this Department, which I do not think it deserves, and which if I did think it deserved I would not commence now to pass upon in this way.

Is there any necessity for the amendment? If any proceedings are brought against the Post-Office Department or any officer, does anybody claim that he can plead this bill in bar? Will any lawyer stand here and say that it would be any defense to him? Is it any defense in morals or in law? I do not know that I ought to say it, but it strikes me that it is merely child's play for us to put it in the bill. It ought to be offensive to the good sense of the Senate, it seems to me, as I believe it will be to the country, to put such a thing in the bill. We do not ratify. Who said we did? Who supposes we can? Do we not assume that we have got the power to do it when we say we do not do it by this bill?

Mr. President, I am anxious that this bill shall pass; I am exceedingly anxious that this great service shall not be stricken down; but I will vote against this bill and go home and face my constituents on that vote before I will put myself upon the record as a lawyer to say that any act of mine in voting upon an appropriation bill can be taken as a ratification of any illegal conduct. I will not stultify myself in that way; and I will see the service stricken down before I will be a party to morally condemning a man who I believe has executed the law with the highest purpose and with the very highest end and for the greatest good of the greatest number in this country. It is an injustice that the Senate ought to be ashamed of. It is an injustice that the people will hold the Senate responsible for, and they will do that especially in the West, where they have derived the benefits of this service.

It is not an ordinary, trifling thing that you now seek to do. It is to traduce by the vote of the Senate and to slander, so to speak, one of the highest officers of this Government without any evidence. While the Senator from Kentucky says that he knows the officer has acted in violation of law, men on this floor equally as well versed in the law as he, equally as competent to judge, with a knowledge of as many facts, declare upon their convictions as Senators that he has not violated the law.

Mr. President, I do not propose to vote for any such thing, nor do I propose to be driven into voting for any such thing, although this bill may fail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if this is child's play, as the Senator from Colorado says, then I am in favor of child's play. I do not think it is. It has been stated by the responsible organ of this body, or by members of that responsible organ, the Committee on Appropriations, that the expenditures and contracts already made by some officers of the Post-Office Department have exceeded the authority that the law reposed in them and are against the statute which commands that no officer of the United States shall involve the Government of the United States in any contract or responsibility beyond the means that Congress shall have already provided to execute and carry out that contract. I do not know whether that statement is correct or not. If it be correct, for one I do not intend to vote for any bill that shall operate as a condonation or ratification of any such illegal act. I have the impression that it is the Congress of the United States that makes laws for this country and disposes of the public money, and that it is the business of every Executive Department to obey the law, no matter whether it thinks that the public service may be better improved in some way by disobeying the law or not; and when Executive Departments can be taught—if they are not taught already; I make no comment on that—that it is their business to obey the law and follow it and not transcend it, there will be one of the reforms in the administration of this Government from forty years ago down to now that all the patriots and white-neck clothed gentlemen and everybody else in this country have been longing for and wishing for. That is my opinion.

I do not intend to pronounce any opinion upon the question whether there has been a violation of law or not; but I do intend to prevent anybody from saying that the effect of this statute, if passed, has been a ratification of any illegal act or unjust discretion of anybody, and so an invitation to try it again. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall vote for this amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think, Mr. President, that the amendment proposed in behalf of the committee is objectionable on the grounds suggested by the Senator from Iowa; nevertheless, in the hope of expediting, not the star service, but the business of the Senate, I ask the committee to listen to an amendment which I have placed upon the table, and which I will offer if it answers the purpose. I move to strike out of the pending amendment all after the word "construed" and insert the words suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out all after the word "construed," in the proposed section, and insert the following:

To affect the validity or legality of the act or omission of any officer of the United States, or to affect any proceeding therefor.

So as to make the section read:

Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed or construed to affect the validity or legality of the act or omission of any officer of the United States, or to affect any proceeding therefor.

Mr. CONKLING. The object of putting those words in lieu of the others, is to obviate an objection which I do not see, but which some other Senators do see. It is thought that the language employed by the committee carries with it some imputation upon somebody. I do not so understand that amendment; but certainly the words which I propose carry no imputation upon anybody. They simply, in colorless phrase, declare that it shall not be a part of the effect of this act to touch one way or the other the legality or validity of any of these proceedings, and I inquire of the Senator from Kentucky whether that will not answer his whole purpose and be acceptable to him?

Mr. BECK. In listening to the amendment offered and looking at the original proposition, I am unable to see any substantial difference, as the Senator from New York says; but the amendment offered by the Committee on Appropriations is a committee amendment, which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] now absent had charge of. It was not what I thought ought to be done. The gentleman acting for the committee ought to speak for the committee. I can only say that I do not see any substantial difference.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will ask the Senate to vote on this amendment in the hope of putting an end to this question; but before I sit down I venture to indulge in one remark.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure, as I always do, to my honorable friend before me while in picturesque and vivid phrase he told us about the benevolent, wholesome, missionary, commendable work of this star service. I believe it all. I make it a point always to believe everything that he says, even sometimes when it would not be so easy to believe it if I said it myself.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. To whom does the Senator refer?

Mr. CONKLING. I mean the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER,] and I wish now that my friend from Iowa calls attention to himself, to put him in the same category. I always make it a point to believe what either of these Senators says. But I also believe that there has been a great deal touching the star service so called, which does not seem wholesome to people quite as discriminating as we are and who know quite as much about it. I happen to be acquainted myself with a number of upright and discerning persons who, with a pretty large knowledge of what has been done in this regard, disapprove very much of it. Therefore, I think it not unreasonable that, in voting this deficiency, we should abstain from complicating ourselves at all with questions with which we have no practical concern at present. I shall vote for the bill with much more satisfaction with such an amendment as I have suggested myself, not meaning to impair at all the force of the words for which I propose it as a substitute.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will not the Senator from New York be kind enough to tell us the difference between his amendment and the other, and why he likes his better?

Mr. CONKLING. I will tell the Senator the difference, which difference does not prevail with me, but does, I discover, prevail with wiser and more discerning men. It is thought by the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] that the words employed by the committee carry some imputation with them upon somebody. The same idea is shared by the honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] who originally called attention to it. Therefore I propose to employ the more customary phrase, I think; I am sure it is more customary in the statutes of the State from which I come; the usual phrase there is, "that nothing in this act shall be deemed to affect one way or the other such and such things." Therefore, I say that nothing in this act shall touch in any way the question of the legality or the validity of any act, or of any omission of any officer of the United States, nor shall it affect any proceeding. That, I think, expresses clearly and fully the idea which the committee intended to convey in the proposed amendment, to which personally, I say frankly to the Senator from West Virginia, I see no objection; but as other Senators do see objection to it, I prefer a form of words inoffensive to them and equally effective for the purpose in view. Therefore I shall vote for the amendment I have offered. If it be the pleasure of the Senate to reject that amendment, for myself I shall vote for the committee's amendment, for I see no offense in it. At the same time I would rather have it in such form that other Senators, who can judge quite as well and I presume better than I can judge, are satisfied with it also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, as amended.

Mr. TELLER. Now let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Nothing contained in this act shall be deemed or construed to affect the validity or legality of the act or omission of any officer of the United States, or to affect any proceeding therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the preamble proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the preamble be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The preamble as proposed as an amendment by the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. The question comes first on the bill under the rules, and on the preamble last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is now in Committee of the Whole. The Chair understands the committee to have reported the preamble as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent on the part of the committee to withdraw the preamble.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to that; but the Senator need not do it. The bill is first to be voted on, I submit to the Chair, and last of all the preamble. When you come to the preamble, all that needs to be done is to abandon the preamble and it goes out.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is true; but I would prefer withdrawing it at once and have no further question about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia asks leave to withdraw the preamble. The Chair hears no objection, and the preamble is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BECK. The title ought to be amended by adding "and for other purposes," there being now included a deficiency for printing as well as for the Post-Office Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend the title by adding "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

TITLES AT HOT SPRINGS.

Mr. GARLAND. In pursuance of the notice I gave several days ago, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4244, a bill to establish titles in Hot Springs, and for other purposes.

Mr. THURMAN. I gave notice some days ago that as soon as the appropriation bills then before the Senate were disposed of I should move to proceed to the consideration of the Geneva award bill. I should make that motion now, but I have become perfectly convinced that I shall facilitate the consideration of that bill by letting this Hot Springs bill be first taken up and got out of the way, either by being passed or defeated. At the same time I wish it understood that I shall feel it my duty if the debate on the Hot Springs bill shall threaten to be prolonged, which I trust it will not be, to move to postpone it in order to take up the Geneva award bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I am just as anxious to have the Geneva award bill taken up as the Senator from Ohio, but this Hot Springs bill ought to have precedence of anything else. There are but a few days in which we can consider it at all. It seems to me that there ought to be unanimous consent to take it up.

Mr. THURMAN. I have stated that I shall not oppose its being taken up, but I must give notice that if it is to produce a long debate I reserve the right to move to postpone it in order to take up the Geneva award bill.

Mr. WHYTE. I understand that the Hot Springs bill has already been taken up.

Mr. GARLAND. Not yet.

Mr. WHYTE. Let it be taken up by general consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the Hot Springs bill, so called.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4244) for the establishment of titles in Hot Springs, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHYTE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GARLAND. Before that motion is put let me make one suggestion.

Mr. WHYTE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to state to the Senator from Maryland and to the Senate that while I do not object to going into executive session at this late hour of the day, it should be remembered that we have but nineteen days after to-day to do anything in this Hot Springs business. The bill has to go back to the House to be acted on there. I hope the Senate will stay with me long enough to-morrow to get through with the bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WHYTE. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and forty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 17, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FORFEITURE OF VESSELS FOR BREACH OF REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and passed the bill (S. No. 939) to amend the law relative to the seizure and forfeiture of vessels for breach of the revenue laws. I think there will be no objection to the bill. It passed the Senate unanimously, and was favorably acted upon by the Committee on Ways and Means on three or four different occasions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no vessel used by any person or corporation as common carriers for the transaction of their business as such common carriers shall be subject to seizure or forfeiture by force of the provisions of title 34 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, unless it shall appear that the owner or master of such vessel at the time of the alleged illegal act was a consenting party or privy thereto.

Mr. CONGER. Who introduced this bill?

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] asks to have it taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. CONGER. If it is for reference I have no objection.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I think it should go to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects to immediate consideration.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Then I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAPP. As I shall be absent when the Committee on the Public Lands will be called, I ask consent to make some reports from that committee, to go on the Calendar.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA.

Mr. SAPP, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1064) to grant to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public use, a certain lake or bayou situated near said city; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARZEL ALTMAN.

Mr. SAPP also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1373) for the relief of Marzel Altman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN R. TAGGERT.

Mr. SAPP also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1374) for the relief of John R. Taggart; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SURVEYS IN CRAWFORD COUNTY, WISCONSIN.

Mr. SAPP also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 4596) authorizing the survey of parts of certain townships in Crawford County, Wisconsin, and making an appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HENRY GEE.

Mr. SAPP also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 4034) for the relief of Henry Gee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TITLE TO ISLANDS, BEDS OF LAKES, ETC.

Mr. SAPP also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 4378) to transfer to the States the title to all islands, beds of lakes, (not navigable,) bayous, sloughs, ponds, &c., which at the time all public lands were surveyed by the Government were meandered, with amendments; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT LAND, VINCENNES, INDIANA.

Mr. SAPP also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3742) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain real estate belonging to the United States, and vesting the title to certain other lands in the city of Vincennes, in the State of Indiana, and for other purposes, with amendments; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOMESTEADS.

Mr. SAPP also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1740) to amend section 2305 of the Revised Statutes, relating to soldiers' and sailors' homesteads; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SAPP also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 4227) for the relief of settlers on public lands.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that that bill be now considered. It is a very short one, although very important, and, in a few minutes, I think I can explain it to the satisfaction of the House.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. McMAHON. I object to the consideration of the bill, and demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being demanded, the bill and amendments will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

METHOD OF SETTLING CLAIMS.

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, presented a resolution directing the Speaker of the House to appoint a special committee to investigate the present method of settling claims under the act of July 4, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MANNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to introduce a resolution for present consideration. I will remark when I introduced the same resolution the other day it provided the matters referred to should be inquired into by the Judiciary Committee. I thought that was the proper committee to which the resolution should be referred, but the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] objected because he thought it should go to the Pacific Railroad Committee. I agreed with him it should go there, and it is so provided in the body of the resolution.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I withdraw my objection, the reference having been changed.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution to inquire into alleged contract between the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railway Companies and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

Whereas it has been announced in the public press that a contract has been entered into by and between the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Union Pacific Railroad Company on the one part, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company on the other part, by the terms of which contract the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in consideration of receiving $1,320,000 annually for five years from the railway companies, binds itself to accept and charge such rates for freight and passengers as may be fixed by the railroad companies, and to collect the same from the commercial public; and

Whereas the effect of such a contract is directly prejudicial to the public interest and contrary to the public policy that controlled Congress in chartering the Union Pacific Railroad Company and in granting to both railway companies large subsidies in money and lands: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Pacific Railroad be directed to inquire, specifically, whether such a contract exists, and to do so shall have power to send for persons and papers, and shall report what legislation is necessary to protect the public interests in the premises; and such committee may sit in vacation and report by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BREWER. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. BREWER. A similar resolution has passed the Senate ordering a like investigation. I do not see why we should go over the same ground at double expense.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I desire to correct the Journal of Monday. On Monday I offered a resolution providing for the appointment of a joint committee to examine and report upon claims against the Government and moved its reference to the Committee on Rules. It was so referred by the Speaker, as appears by the RECORD; but by some means its entry upon the Journal was omitted. I now desire to have the entry made.

The SPEAKER. This seems to be a joint resolution.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. But it provides for the establishment of a House committee.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Yes; and of a Senate committee also.

The SPEAKER. Then it should be a concurrent resolution.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. It also provides for an appropriation, which cannot be made without the signature of the President. I offered it under Rule XXIV, which provides:

1. Each Monday morning, during a session of Congress, all the States and Territories shall be called in their alphabetical order for bills, joint resolutions, and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures, and House resolutions, for reference, and, on this call only, resolutions of inquiry directed to the Heads of the Executive Departments shall be in order, to be submitted and referred to the appropriate committees, which shall report thereon to the House within one week.

The SPEAKER. A joint resolution is the same as a bill, and would have to go to the President for his approval.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. That is precisely what I want in that case.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman want the President's approval of the House committee?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I cannot reach the matter in any other way except by the President's signature.

The SPEAKER. It would be a very unusual thing for the President of the United States to make a law in that way, but the Chair has no wish about it if the gentleman desires to have it referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The only reason that I presented the matter in this form is that there is no provision under the rules by which it can be offered at any other time than on Mondays.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I understand, for the purpose I have in view, the demand for the regular order is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order. The gentleman has risen to a privileged question.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I will get through directly. There is no provision in the rules by which this resolution can be introduced at any other time, and therefore I was driven by necessity to avail myself of that call.

The SPEAKER. In order that the committee might make it a concurrent instead of a joint resolution?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The committee can report it back in any form it sees proper. I want the subject acted upon in some way.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to make a privileged report.

Mr. BREWER. I demand the regular order.

OUACHITA RIVER IMPROVEMENT—EAST RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. REAGAN. I have a privileged report from the Committee on Commerce. I send to the Clerk's desk two resolutions calling for information from the Departments which are reported back under the rule.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Has the demand for the regular order been withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. If it is withdrawn the Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BREWER. I have not withdrawn the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, but the gentleman from Texas rises to make a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested and directed to furnish to this House a statement showing the amount of appropriations made within the past ten years for the survey and improvement of the Ouachita River; what amount has been expended, and in what manner, and for what purposes these expenditures have been made.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk read the second resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to this House any information in his Department in relation to the bridge now being erected over the East River at New York, and his opinion as to whether the said bridge is not an obstruction to commerce.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the morning hour.

Mr. McMAHON. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the purpose of considering the deficiency appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken; and the House determined to dispense with the morning hour, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. McMAHON. I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the deficiency appropriation bill, and pending that I move that all general debate be limited to one minute.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to allow some further time. I would want about thirty minutes myself. Let the gentleman say an hour and a half.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to say to gentlemen on the other side that there is a pay-roll of $3,000 or $3,500 a day depending upon the passage of this bill. It has already been very fully discussed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the disposition on this side is to sit out the bill to-day. We have twice dispensed with the morning hour and I have no doubt we will get through with it to-day. But I ask the gentleman to allow us a little time for this final debate. It will save time when the bill comes to be considered by paragraphs; for those who do not get in during the debate under the hour rule will otherwise take the time they want in the five-minutes debate.

Mr. McMAHON. I will modify the motion so that all general debate shall be limited to forty-five minutes; and I will say to the gentleman from Ohio if he desires to occupy thirty minutes he may have that time, and we will reserve fifteen minutes for this side.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not like to agree to that for myself; for there may be others on this side who desire time, and I would not like to be a party to any agreement by which I should have the whole of the time allowed to this side.

Mr. BLOUNT. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] that he make it an hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be an hour and a half.

Mr. McMAHON. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House, I move that all general debate be limited to one hour.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to amend the motion so as to make the time an hour and a half.

Mr. McMAHON. It ought to be understood in any arrangement to be made that one-half of the time is reserved for this side.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. McMAHON. I insist on my motion that all general debate be closed in one hour.

Mr. HISCOCK. And I have moved to amend so as to make the time an hour and a half.

The question being put on Mr. HISCOCK's amendment, there were—ayes 83, noes 74.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The motion limiting debate, as amended, was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4924) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House general debate on the pending bill is limited to one hour and a half, to be divided equally between the two sides of the House.

Mr. WEAVER. May it please the Chair, it will delight the party I represent to yield the time we may be entitled to to either the one side or the other in this discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAYES,] who is entitled to the floor, will control the part of the time allotted to his side of the House.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion which has been called forth by the bill now under consideration, being aware at the very beginning of what the democrats were aiming to accomplish. It may be set down as a fact that when the democrats on this floor make such an outrageous onslaught upon any Department or bureau of the Government as they have made on the Government Printing Office they have some object in view other than merely to expose the frauds which they may allege have been perpetrated therein. It is not to be expected that they will always step forward and openly declare what this object is, although in the present case they have not hesitated so to do. What, then, is this object? It is none other than for the democratic majority in Congress to get control of the Government Printing Office; and the method by which this is to be accomplished is clearly set forth in the amendment offered on last Friday by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.] That amendment proposes to take from the President the power to appoint a Public Printer and to confer that power upon this House. In other words, it proposes to give the democratic majority in this House the power to turn out of office the present Public Printer, who is a republican, and to put in his place some man who is a democrat. This is the object of all this talk about mismanagement and fraud in the Government Printing Office.

These gentlemen want to get this office, with its fifteen hundred or two thousand employes, under their control. Such an office, with such a large number of employes, presided over by a republican when both Houses of Congress are democratic, is rather more than the average democratic Congressman can stand. He knows that he has a score or more of constituents whom he could put into that office if the democrats had control of it, and who would use all their influence to have him continued in his present position as a representative of the people. To those of us who know the greed of democrats for office, and who have observed the hundreds of democrats hanging around this Capitol during the past three years hungry from long fasting, it is not a matter of great surprise that the democratic majority here should seek to get control of this office. As a party measure it would be a great thing. It would furnish the democratic member an opportunity to fulfill the promises he made to some of his constituents during his last campaign. It would help him greatly in working up a sentiment in his district in favor of his return. Besides this, it would assist the great democratic party wonderfully in its efforts to elect a President next fall. All of these things come thronging to the minds of gentlemen on the other side when they think about getting control of this office, and as they dwell upon them they become more fully determined to do everything in their power to bring about the desired change.

They say that a change is necessary, and are determined to effect one if possible; in fact, they determined upon a change in the Forty-fifth Congress. It was privately hinted to me several times by democratic members of that body that the democrats would have control of the Government Printing Office as soon as they got control of the Senate. Hence it was that, as soon as I entered upon my duties as a member of the Committee on Printing at the extra session about a year ago, I was met by something like half a dozen propositions for making some change in the management of that office. These propositions all had their advocates, and several hungry democrats hung around the Capitol for weeks urging their peculiar views upon members of Congress, and ready to take "any little crumbs of comfort" which might chance to fall to their lot when the change was effected. Nothing, however, has been done toward effecting this change until now, when this amendment is brought forward and sought to be attached to this appropriation bill. To show that a change is necessary the majority on this floor raise the cry of mismanagement and fraud; but this cry, as all have observed, is of a very vague and indefinite nature. The charges made are all general in their character. Search all the speeches which have been made upon the democratic side since this discussion began, and, while they are all full of abuse of the Public Printer and of allegations of mismanagement and fraud, you will nowhere find a single instance where the speaker has made a definite charge and substantiated it by facts.

Why, sir, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] admitted that he could not put his finger on any one thing in the Government Printing Office and say that in that thing there had been any dishonesty or fraud; and the other democratic speakers might as well have admitted this, for their speeches all show that they have no more ability in this regard than the gentleman from Mississippi has.

But even supposing that there have been mismanagement and fraud in this office, why have not the democratic majority in Congress exposed them? The democrats have had control of this House for five years, and if the charges they make against this office be true, they are to blame for not showing them up and punishing the guilty parties. This office was one of the many things which they proposed to reform in the Forty-fourth Congress, and no sooner was that body organized than the House Committee on Printing was instructed to investigate it, and did investigate it. Now, if there was anything wrong in the management of that office, why was it not developed and proven by that committee, and corrected by this House? This House was overwhelmingly democratic then, and hence there could be no excuse, if wrongs existed, for not correcting them and guarding against their recurrence in the future by proper legislation. But the Forty-fourth Congress expired, and no action was taken by the democratic House, simply because they had discovered nothing to base any action upon.

Not content with what the Forty-fourth Congress had done, the democratic majority in the Forty-fifth Congress proceeded to investigate this office. And what did they find? Nothing to show that there was the least mismanagement or rascality, notwithstanding all the vast amount of blow and bluster that have been made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] who headed that investigation, and other gentlemen on that side. I have here, sir, a copy of the report of this committee. In this report I find both a majority and minority report. The minority report is signed by Messrs. Burdick, Keightley, BAKER, and BAYNE, and from it I take the following, which I wish the Clerk to read:

The undersigned, a minority of the Committee on Public Expenditures, regret that they cannot concur with the majority of the said committee, in the general conclusions by them reached and stated, in their report in the matter of the inquiry made in reference to the public printing and binding.

Further, the minority do not concur in the recommendations made by the majority for a change in the system and method now employed in executing the public printing.

The minority of the committee desire to herein respectfully state some of the reasons for their dissent.

The inquiry made by the sub-committee, of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] was chairman, has been protracted and of a character such as to detect and discover frauds and abuses, if any existed, had been practiced, or permitted, in the management and conduct of the Government Printing Office.

The sub-committee entered upon its investigations on the 30th day of March, 1878. Meetings were frequently held since that date, and various witnesses were called before the committee from different parts of the country, as well as persons connected with the Government Printing Office. Experts were employed to make careful and thorough examination of the books, records, and papers on file in the Government Printing Office. The testimony of such witnesses was taken, reduced to writing, and is voluminous.

From the inquiry made and testimony reported it appears that the Government Printing Office is thoroughly equipped with the most improved machinery and implements; that it possesses ample facilities for the execution of the public printing and binding.

Particular inquiry was made into the manner in which the work was done, whether the cost thereof was excessive or otherwise, and whether or not any abuses or irregularities existed or had been practiced in the conduct of the office.

From the testimony it conclusively appears that the public printing and binding is executed in a correct, compact, and handsome manner. The materials used have been of an excellent quality. Both in respect to style of workmanship and quality of materials used, general if not universal satisfaction has been given to the officers of the Government for whom the work has been executed.

Objection has been made to the present system of executing the public printing on account of its alleged excessive cost. The minority of the committee have considered this objection, and have to say the cost of the public printing under the present system consists of what is paid to officers for salaries, to employees for wages, and for materials consumed. These items of cost are independent of what is paid for or invested in the building for an office, and the machinery, implements, and type it contains.

If the salaries of officers be unreasonably large, if the wages paid employees be exorbitant, if the prices paid for materials consumed be excessive, then it would follow that the cost of executing the public printing would be great. But, on the contrary, if the salaries be reasonable, wages moderate, and prices low, then, provided there be no abuses, but fidelity on the part of officers and employees, the cost of the public printing must be reasonable, if not moderate.

The minority of the committee think the testimony taken shows, and the facts to be, that the salaries paid are not exorbitant; that the wages paid employees are low indeed, and that the prices paid for materials are not unreasonable; that the discipline in the office is shown to be good. It will not be forgotten that the salaries paid to officers and the wages paid to printers and binders are fixed or limited by law.

The conclusion of the minority of the committee on this branch of the investigation is, that the cost of the public printing and binding is not excessive, but, considering the great pains taken in its execution, the manner in which the employees are paid, and the schedule of prices for labor fixed by law, the public printing and binding, under the present system, is executed at reasonable cost and expense.

From these statements it would not appear that extravagance prevailed in the management of the Government Printing Office, nor that the Government is paying more for its printing and binding than the same class of work could be obtained for if executed by contractors or private establishments.

The testimony taken does not, in the judgment of the minority of the committee, show a single instance of design on the part of the present Public Printer, who we think is with reasonable care and fidelity superintending the Government Printing Office, or any of his subordinates, to defraud the Government in any degree.

Now, sir, as I have said, this report is signed by Messrs. Burdick, Keightley, BAKER, and BAYNE, all high-toned, honest, and intelligent gentlemen; and it is to be supposed that if there had been such rascalities practiced in this office as the gentlemen on the other side assert, these gentlemen would not have discovered and exposed them? No one who is acquainted with these men would believe for a moment that they would seek under any circumstances to cover up fraud, or to shield any person from punishment who was guilty of it. If the charges made so freely are true, why do not the democrats, who have control of both Houses of Congress, take the matter up and have the guilty parties punished? The Constitution says that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment." If the Public Printer has done half the dishonest deeds charged against him he should be impeached, and every one on this floor knows that the democratic majority would impeach him if they thought they could make out a case against him. The very fact that they do not impeach him is proof sufficient that they have no faith in the charges made, and do not believe that there is enough evidence, even in the voluminous report of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] to justify them in making the attempt.

But, sir, suppose we admit that there are frauds and abuses in this office, why, I ask, can they not be corrected just as well under the present system as under the one proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi? Whoever has charge of the Government Printing Office, whether he be appointed by the President or chosen by this House, must conduct that office in accordance with law. If the laws are not what they ought to be where rests the blame? The gentleman from Ohio in his speech the other day said this office had less safeguards around it than any other Department of the Government. If this be so Congress, and Congress alone, is to blame for it. Congress makes the laws which govern this establishment, and it can and ought to throw around it all the safeguards that are necessary. But let us look a moment at these laws and see if they are quite as loose as the gentleman would have us believe. According to these laws the Public Printer is appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall be a practical printer and versed in the art of book-binding. He shall give a bond in the sum of $100,000, with approved sureties, conditioned that he shall faithfully discharge the duties of his office and properly account for all money and property that may come into his possession.

The money appropriated by Congress shall only be drawn from the Treasury by the Public Printer in installments, not exceeding at any one time two-thirds the amount of his bond, and for all money thus drawn he shall render a strict account and return proper vouchers for its disbursement or expenditure.

In addition to these provisions of law the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses have a general control of the public printing and the management of the Printing Office. This committee is required to fix the standards of paper used, to advertise for proposals for paper required, to open all proposals, to award contracts, and to give direction relative to the printing of the debates of Congress. Besides this the Public Printer is limited by law as to the price he may pay for composition and for time-work to printers and binders.

Now, sir, it would seem that these laws would furnish some little safeguard against the perpetration of frauds in this office. But if they are not all that is needed, let Congress enact other and more stringent ones. I do not care how strict these laws are made. I am no apologist for rascality or dishonesty of any kind. I want this office as well as every other office or bureau under this Government so guarded by proper legislation and supervision that it will be impossible for any one connected with it to perpetrate a fraud without being detected; and Congress should not rest satisfied until this is done. But is it necessary, in order to accomplish this in the Government Printing Office, to strike down the present system in that office? I think not. Some change may be necessary in the laws relating to it, but that is all. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] however, does not seem to look at it in this way. He thinks we must tear down this system in order to prevent fraud. He urges the adoption of his amendment because it provides for taking an annual inventory of the material and stock on hand, as by such an inventory, he says, we can save a vast amount to the Government each year. But all this can be provided for just as well under our present system as under the one he proposes. There is no necessity for revolutionizing the whole management of the Government Printing Office in order to accomplish a simple thing like this. If our laws, as they now are, are defective, let us change them, and then adopt such new legislation as may be necessary. This is the sensible and proper thing to do, and it is the thing which gentlemen on the other side will do if they are at all desirous of accomplishing the best results by the best means.

The gentleman from Ohio complains because the Government printing is costing so much. He says that our printing bill, if we pass the measure now before us, will amount to $1,900,000 for the present year. This is all true, but who is to blame for such a large expenditure of money for printing? Whatever printing has been done has been done according to law. It has been ordered either by Congress or the Departments and the amount, as every member of Congress must know, is enormous. That office not only does the work ordered by Congress, but it also does the work for the Department of State, including books of instruction, blank-books and blanks for consuls throughout the world; the books, blanks, and blank-books for the Treasury Department, including the custom-houses, mints, sub-treasuries, and internal-revenue offices for all parts of the United States; for the Post-Office Department, including all the post-offices, numbering over thirty-nine thousand, the money-order offices, domestic and international; for the War Department, including the books and blanks for the Army of the United States, arsenals, depot quartermasters, Surgeon-General's Office, Signal-Office; for the Interior Department, including the land offices in all parts of the country, the Patent Office, Pension Office, and pension agents; for the Navy Department, including the Navy, navy-yards, Marine Corps, Naval Observatory, Nautical Almanac Office, and Hydrographic Office. In addition to all this class of work the Government Printing Office does the work for the Department of Justice, the Supreme Court of the United States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Department of Agriculture, the Library of Congress, and the Court of Claims.

From the report of the Public Printer for the year ended June 30, 1879, I take the following, which shows the vast amount of work executed at the Government Printing Office during that year:

The first table shows the total number of blanks, pamphlets, and documents, blank-books, and miscellaneous volumes, printed and bound for the Executive Departments:

Department.	Blanks, envelopes, &c.	Pamphlets and documents.	Blank-books.	Miscellaneous binding.
Treasury	46,251,991	311,523	104,825	4,382
War	6,317,471	1,018,180	5,396	3,168
Navy	850,693	122,242	9,423	12,096
Interior	9,113,929	1,687,007	67,213	5,617

Judiciary	77,980	35,759	98	47
Total	98,097,933	3,451,086	246,564	16,289

The next table shows the number of copies of documents, &c., printed by authority of Congress, as well as on resolutions of the Senate and House, and miscellaneous printing done on requisitions from the Secretary and Clerk, respectively, the Librarian of Congress, and on private orders for extra copies of public documents made during the same time. The number of pages are for the documents only:

Printed for—	Blanks, envelopes, &c.	Pamphlets and documents.	Pages.	Blank-books.	Miscellaneous binding.
Congress	8,403,426	24,508	1,196
Senate	1,402,733	19,776	9

Total	105,812,586	18,701,398	247,241	26,276

As an evidence of the increase of the work in this office, the number of blanks printed this year exceeds those printed last year by 30,854,933, and the blank-books exceed those manufactured last year by 126,511.

The following table shows the cost of printing done for each and all of the various Departments of the Government for the same year:

Department.	Printing and paper for same.		Total cost of printing and paper.	Blank-books, binding, ruling, &c.	Aggregate cost of printing, paper, and binding.
	Printing.	Paper.
State	$5,836 89	$2,458 60	$8,295 49	$7,686 10	$15,981 59

The following table shows the actual expenditures for all work executed at the Government Printing Office during the same year:

For salaries, &c., in the office of the Public Printer	$15,485 69
For the public printing	778,338 26
For paper for the public printing	301,603 60
For the public binding	422,242 24
For the Congressional Record	140,205 71
For lithographing, mapping, and engraving	52,019 11
For completing Catalogue of Library of Congress	3,725 02
For fire-escape ladders	2,244 00
For telephonic connection	147 86
Total	1,716,012 00

Now, sir, from these tables we see not only that our printing bill is large, but that the amount of work done is enormous. As every one knows, the size of our printing bills depends upon the quantity of work done. Hence, if we want smaller bills we must order less work, and I would say to the gentlemen on the other side who are complaining of our large printing bills, that they and their friends who have control of the two Houses of Congress have it in their power to make these bills as small as they please. Order less printing, hold fewer and shorter sessions, force no extra sessions, when you come to Washington come to legislate for the good of the country and not for party, make fewer political speeches to fill up the RECORD, stop consuming time by trying to attach political riders to appropriation bills, and then you will find that your printing bills will be reduced in size very materially.

But, Mr. Speaker, while the gentleman from Ohio is deprecating the size of our printing bills, he comes out as the champion of a scheme which, if once adopted by Congress, would greatly enlarge those bills instead of decreasing them as he seems so anxious to do. I find in the report from which he quoted so freely the other day a bill which he and the other democratic members of his committee recommend should be enacted into law, and which provides for letting out a large share of the Government printing to be done by the lowest bidder. In speaking of this bill these gentlemen use these words:

If enacted into law it will, in our opinion, remedy some of the evils found to exist, and effect salutary reforms in the administration of the public printing and binding.

Now, sir, I must beg leave to differ from these gentlemen in the opinion here expressed. I regard the proposition to put out the public printing, or any portion of it, to the lowest bidder as a proposition fraught with great evil and leading directly and surely toward extravagance instead of toward economy. It is true, sir, that there are to-day, as there always have been, a few men hanging about this city who are seeking for a job, and who can always make it appear that it would be greatly to the interest of the Government to get its printing done by contract. But it must be borne in mind that these men are interested parties. They are working for their own good. They want to induce Congress to tear down the magnificent printing office that we have established, for the simple reason that they may get an opportunity to do a portion of the printing which we now do ourselves. As an argument in favor of their scheme they tell us that we can get our printing done much cheaper if we let it out to the lowest bidder than if we do it ourselves. But, sir, is this true? I am inclined to think not. In fact, I know it is not, if our experience in the past is worth anything. We have tried the contract system in the years of the past, and have found it much more expensive than the system we now have. I have here tables showing the cost of the printing and binding for Congress for seven years, under both the present and the old system, and to these tables I invite the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, believing that he will be greatly profited if he will give them a little careful study.

§ For nine months only.

These tables show that notwithstanding we printed more than double the number of pages during the last seven years of the present system than we printed during the last seven years of the old system, the cost was $831,149.22 less under the former than under the latter. These figures are very instructive and should be carefully studied before we make up our minds to abandon our present admirable system and adopt the plan of getting our printing done by contract.

Having said this much, Mr. Chairman, I wish to notice some of the assertions made by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. WILSON.] That gentleman in his speech of yesterday says that the Committee on Printing have come to the conclusion that the Government Printing Office is not managed in the interest of economy. This may be true as far as the majority on that committee are concerned, but it is not true of the minority.

Never, sir, since I have been a member of that committee have I, either in the meetings of that committee or elsewhere, expressed the opinion that I thought that office was not economically managed. It is true, sir, that I have not served on the Committee on Printing for any great length of time—only during the present Congress—but since I have been a member of it I have taken occasion to look into the workings of the Government Printing Office somewhat, and I stand here to-day to say that I believe that that office is as ably, honestly, and economically managed as any department of this Government. I look upon Mr. Defrees, the present Public Printer, not only as an honorable but as an able man, and I do not believe that he would condescend under any circumstances either to perpetrate fraud himself or to connive at it on the part of any one else. Not only this, but I protest against the efforts of the democratic majority of this House to get possession of the Government Printing Office by attempting to blacken the character of a high-minded and honorable public officer. If they have made up their minds to make a change in the management of this office, let them do it in a manly and honorable way, and not in the mean, underhanded, and despicable way they are now doing.

The gentleman asked me if I could not take the Government Printing Office and run it cheaper than it is now run. If I were to run it as a private enterprise I have no doubt I could run it much cheaper, just the same as I could run any department of this Government cheaper, by cutting down the wages of employes and compelling those employes to work ten instead of eight hours per day. Unless this were done I am not prepared to say that I could do any better in this regard than the Public Printer is now doing. I am aware, sir, that there are many persons hanging about this city who have made the assertion that they could do the Government printing at a much less figure than it now costs us. But this assertion is made by persons who are anxious to break down our magnificent printing establishment, hoping if they can do this to get a portion of the Government printing to do themselves. One of these men is Mr. Rives, to whom the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] made reference in his speech of yesterday. It appears that this gentleman not only claims that he can do this work cheaper than it is now being done, but has actually made a proposition to do it for 90 per cent. of what we now pay, provided we give him charge of the Government Printing Office.

Now, sir, it may be that Mr. Rives can do this and at the same time, as he says, make money out of it. But he can do it only by cutting down the wages of his employes and by making his employes work ten hours a day instead of eight, as the employes at the Government Printing Office now do. It will be easy for him to run this establishment and make money out of it, even at his offer, if he will put his workmen upon starvation wages. But I cannot think the democrats in this House will favor a thing of this kind. The democracy have set themselves up as the especial champion of the laboring classes, and it would scarcely be consistent with their professions for their representatives upon this floor to deliberately turn this office over to a man who, they know, in order to live must oppress labor by starving the laboring-man.

The gentleman from West Virginia quotes from a certain letter, signed by Alfred Thomas and others, and says that if these gentlemen "are correct in their statement there is an egregious error in the accounts of Mr. Defrees, an error which this House ought to correct by changing the management of that department." The statement of these gentlemen is that during the months of April, May, and June last over one-half of the working force of the Government Printing Office was furloughed, and yet the amount paid out at the office was not diminished any of any consequence during those months. But, sir, this statement is easily explained. The figures referred to show the disbursements of the office, and the money paid out was paid out largely for work done during the preceding months. For instance, during the month of June there was paid out the sum of $55,683.97, but of this amount $23,948.58 were earned in May. For the month of April the amount paid out was $61,052.67, but of this amount $30,609.81 were earned during the month of March. I have in my hand a statement from the Public Printer, which will explain this whole matter, and which I wish to print as a part of my remarks.

In July, 1878, there was disbursed on account of pay of employes in the public printing, (see Public Printer's Report for 1879, page 29,) $61,291.54. Of this amount $20,178.11 was for labor performed in June, 1878, and was paid out of the appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1878, and $41,113.43 was for labor performed in July.

This table explains itself and needs no comment.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to remark in conclusion that we ought to pass this bill as a simple appropriation bill without further delay. The Printing Office is in need of money to pay the workmen there employed. Already a large number of employés have been discharged because there was no money to pay them. These people, some of whom are widows with families depending upon them for support, have no other means of obtaining a livelihood than their labor in this office. Already some of these people are suffering for the want of food and other necessities which their labor would bring them if they could be again set at work. Let us, then, stop all discussion, strike down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, and pass the bill without further delay.

I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]
Mr. GARFIELD. The discussion of this bill has concentrated upon two topics, the public printing and the election laws.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

On the subject of the public printing I shall take no time, except to say this: After one of the saddest histories in the experience of this Government with the old contract system, which broke down by the weight of its own corruption, it was developed and proved beyond any controversy that in the four years preceding the administration of Abraham Lincoln, out of the private profits on the public printing and binding, the sum of $100,000 was contributed by the Public Printer for political purposes, mainly to carry the democratic elections in Pennsylvania; and that vast contribution did not exhaust the profits of the Public Printer out of the Government. This exposure destroyed the wretched contract system; and thereafter the Government itself assumed the responsibility of the work. At first the Senate or the House of Representatives elected a printer, as they had a manifest right to do under the clause of the Constitution which gives each House the power to elect its own officers. But when, by and by, the office grew into a great national establishment, in which all the printing and binding for all departments of the Government was done, it became manifest that the Senate was exercising a power of appointment unwarranted by the Constitution; and in the year 1874, on the motion of Mr. Hale, of New York, a resolution was adopted by a two-thirds vote suspending the rules of the House and making in order, on a sundry civil service appropriation bill, an amendment to change the law and make the Printer an officer of the United States, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. I had charge of that bill and voted for the amendment, as did nearly all my associates; and it was adopted by the almost unanimous vote of this House, both parties uniting in declaring that the old law was unconstitutional, and that experience had proved it unwise; republicans taking their share of responsibility for their own blunders and mistakes; all agreeing that the law ought to conform to the Constitution.

When the democratic party came into power in 1876, they amended that law by making it take effect immediately. We had made it take effect when a vacancy should occur in the office of Public Printer. In 1876 the law was so changed as to make it take effect immediately. And that passed by the general consent of both parties. The proposition now is to go back, and, in the face of our past experience, make a change in this law which will not affect in any way the question of economy, which will not change one iota of the machinery of the management of the public printing, and does not pretend to be in the direction of economy; but merely abolishes a constitutional office and creates an unconstitutional one; takes the appointing power out of the hands of the President and unlawfully places it in the hands of this House, merely to get some democrat into office. This is to be done for no public good, but to satisfy the demands of party hunger. I have no doubt that this amendment will be, as it certainly ought to be, ruled out of order, and I will waste no further words in discussing it.

THE ELECTION LAWS.

I will now call attention, during the short time left me, to what I consider a matter of far graver moment. My colleague, [Mr. McMAHON,] in his speech opening the discussion upon this bill, made the announcement in substance, and it remains uncontradicted and not protested against by any one on his side of the House, first, that "we have not hitherto made, do not in this bill, and will not in any future bill, make any appropriation whatever for supervisors or special deputy marshals, so far as they have to do with congressional elections." He asserts that it was not proper for any officer of the Government to appoint special deputy marshals when no appropriation had been made for that specific purpose.

Then further on he declares—I quote from his printed speech:

And I desire to say that because the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the election law is constitutional by a sort of eight-by-seven decision—and I mean by that a division apparently according to party lines, (without impugning the good faith of any member of the Supreme Court, but to show how differently a legal question may appear to persons who have been educated in different political schools)—that although that court has decided the constitutionality of the law, that when we come, as legislators, to appropriate money it is our duty to say, is this law constitutional? or, if constitutional, is it a good law, and are we bound to appropriate money for it?

He undertakes, as will be seen, to throw contempt on that decision by styling it "a sort of eight-by-seven decision." I remind him that it is a seven-to-two decision, having been adopted by a larger number of the members of the court than the majority of the decisions of that tribunal. It is a decision of a broad, sweeping character, and declares that Congress may take the whole control of congressional elections, or a partial control, as they choose; that the election law as it stands on the national statute-book is the supreme law of the land on that subject.

LAW OF THE UNITED STATES ARE THE LAWS OF EVERY STATE.

More than that: the Supreme Court, not only in this case but in another recent case, has made a declaration which ought to be engraven upon the minds and hearts of all the people of this country. And this is its substance:

That a law of Congress interpenetrates and becomes a part of every law of every State of this Union to which its subject-matter is applicable, and is binding upon all people and covers every foot of our soil.

This is the voice of the Constitution. Now, therefore, under this decision the election laws of the United States are the laws of every State of this Union. No judge of election, no State officer or other person connected with any congressional election, no elector who offers his ballot at any such election can, with impunity, lift his hand or do any act against any of the provisions of these laws. They rest down upon congressional elections in every State like the "casing air," broad and general, protecting with their dignity every act and penetrating with their authority every function of congressional elections. They are the supreme law of the land on that subject.

CONGRESS THREATENS TO DISOBEY THE LAW.

But now a Representative, speaking for the democratic party in this House, rises, not with the plea which he could have made with some show of plausibility last year, that the law is unconstitutional and that therefore they would not enforce it—but, with a constitutional law, declared so by the Supreme Court, covering him and filling the Republic from end to end, reaching everywhere and covering every foot of our soil where a congressional election can be held—he rises in his place and declares that the democratic party will not execute that law nor permit it to be obeyed.

We who are the sworn law-makers of the nation, and ought to be examples of respect for and obedience to the law—we, who before we took our first step in legislation, swore before God and our country that we would support the supreme law of the land—we are now invited to become conspicuous leaders in the violation of the law. My colleague announces his purpose to break the law and invites Congress to follow him in his assault upon it.

Mr. Chairman, by far the most formidable danger that threatens the Republic to-day is the spirit of law-breaking which shows itself in many turbulent and alarming manifestations. The people of the Pacific Coast, after two years of wrestling with communism in the city of San Francisco, have finally grappled with this lawless spirit, and the leader of it was yesterday sentenced to penal servitude as a violator of the law. But what can we say to Dennis Kearney and his associates, if to-day we announce ourselves the foremost law-breakers of the country and set an example to all the turbulent and vicious elements of disorder to follow us?

MANDATORY CHARACTER OF THE ELECTION LAW.

My colleague [Mr. McMAHON] tries to shield his violation of the law behind a section of the statutes which provides that no disbursing or other officer shall make any contract involving the expenditure of money beyond what is appropriated for the purpose. I answer that I hold in my hand a later law, a later statute, which governs the restrictive law of which he speaks, which governs him and governs the courts. It is the election law itself.

I invite attention briefly to its substance. Sections 2011 and 2012 of the Revised Statutes provide that upon the application of any two citizens of any city of more than twenty thousand inhabitants to have a national election guarded and scrutinized, the judge of the circuit court of the United States shall hold his court open during the ten days preceding the election. The law commands the judge of the court to do so.

In the open court from day to day, and from time to time, the judge shall appoint, and, under the seal of the court, shall commission two citizens of different political parties who are voters within the precinct where they reside, to be supervisors of the election. That law is mandatory upon the judge. Should he refuse to obey, he can be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. He must not stop to inquire whether an appropriation has been made to pay these supervisors. The rights of citizens are involved, and upon their application the judge must act.

Again section 2021 provides that on the application of two citizens the marshal of the United States shall appoint special deputy marshals to protect the supervisors in the execution of their duty. And the law is mandatory upon the marshal. He must obey it, under the pains and penalties of the law. What then? When the supervisors and special deputy marshals have been appointed they find their duties plainly prescribed in the law. And then section 5521 provides that if they neglect or refuse to perform fully all these duties enjoined upon them, they are liable to fine and imprisonment. They cannot excuse their neglect by saying, "We will not act because Congress has not appropriated the money to pay us." All these officers are confronted by the imperial command of the law—first to the judge and marshal to appoint, then to the supervisor and deputy marshal to act, and to act under the pains and penalties of fine and imprisonment. Impeachment enforces the obedience of the judge; fine and imprisonment the obedience of the supervisors and deputy marshals.

Now comes one other mandatory order: in the last section of this long chapter of legislation, the majestic command of the law is addressed both to Congress and the Treasury. It declares that there "shall be paid" out of the Treasury $5 per day to these officers as compensation for their services. Here too the law is equally imperious and mandatory; it addresses itself to the conscience of every member of this House, with only this difference: we cannot be impeached for disobedience; we cannot be fined or locked up in the penitentiary for voting "no," and refusing the appropriation; we cannot be fined or imprisoned if we refuse to do our duty. And so, shielded by the immunity of his privilege as a Representative, my colleague sets the example to all officers and all people of deliberately and with clear-sighted purpose violating the law of the land.

Thus he seeks to nullify the law. Thus he hopes to thwart the nation's "collected will."

DANGER OF VIOLATING THE ELECTIONS.

Does my colleague reflect that in doing this he runs the risk of vitiating every national election? Suppose his lead be followed, and the demand of citizens for supervisors and marshals is made and refused because an appropriation has not been voted. Does he not see the possibility of vitiating every election, where fraud and violence are not suppressed and the law has not been complied with? Yet he would risk the validity of all the congressional elections of the United States. Rather than abandon his party's purpose he would make Congress the chief of the law-breakers of the land.

Mr. Chairman, when I took my seat as a member of this House, I took it with all the responsibilities which the place brought upon me; and among others was my duty to keep the obligations of the law. Where the law speaks in mandatory terms to everybody else and then to me, I should deem it cowardly and dishonorable if I should skulk behind my legislative privilege for the purpose of disobeying and breaking the supreme law of the land. [Applause.]

The issue now made is somewhat different from that of the last session, but, in my judgment, it is not less significant and dangerous. I would gladly waive any party advantage which this controversy might give, for the sake of that calm and settled peace which would reign in this Hall if we all obeyed the law. But if the leaders on the other side are still determined to rush upon their fate by forcing upon the country this last issue—that because the democratic party happen not to like a law they will not obey it—because they happen not to approve of the spirit and character of a law they will not let it be executed—I say to gentlemen on the other side if you are determined to make such an issue, it is high time that the American people should know it.

THE SACRED CHARACTER OF THE LAW.

Here is the volume of our laws. More sacred than the twelve tables of Rome, this rock of the law rises in monumental grandeur alike above the people and the President, above the courts, above Congress, commanding everywhere reverence and obedience to its supreme authority. Yet the dominant party in this House virtually declares that "any part of this volume that we do not like and cannot repeal we will disobey. We have tried to repeal these election laws; we have failed because we had not the constitutional power to destroy them; the Constitution says they shall stand in their authority and power; but we, the democratic party, in defiance of the Constitution, declare that if we cannot destroy them outright by repeal, they shall be left to crumble into ruin by wanton and lawless neglect."

Mr. Chairman, I ask gentlemen on the other side whether they wish to maintain this attitude in regard to the legislation of this country? Are they willing to start on a hunt through the statutes, and determine for themselves what they will obey and what they will disobey? That is the meaning of my colleague's speech. If it means anything it means that. He is not an old Brandenburg elector, but an elector in this novel and modern sense, that he will elect what laws he will obey and what he will disobey, and in so far as his power can go, he will infect with his spirit of disobedience all the good people of this country who trust him.

THE DANGEROUS EXAMPLE OF LAW-BREAKING BY CONGRESS.

I ask gentlemen whether this is a time when it is safe to disregard and weaken the authority of law. In all quarters, the civil society of this country is becoming honeycombed through and through by disintegrating forces—in some States by the violation of contracts and the repudiation of debts; in others by open resistance and defiance; in still others by the reckless overturning of constitutions and letting "the red fool-fury of the Seine" run riot among our people and build its blazing altars to the strange gods of ruin and misrule. All these things are shaking the good order of society and threatening the foundations of our Government and our peace. In a time like this, more than ever before, this country needs a body of law-givers clothed and in their right minds, who will lay their hands upon the altar of the law as its defenders, not its destroyers. And yet now, in the name of party, for some supposed party advantage, my colleague from Ohio announces, and no one on his side has said him nay, that they not only have not in the past obeyed but in the future they will not obey this law of the land which the Supreme Court has just crowned with the authority of its sanction. If my colleague chooses to meet that issue, if he chooses to go to the country with that plea, I shall regret it deeply for my country's sake; but if I looked only to my party's interest, it would give me joy to engage in such a struggle.

The contest of last autumn made the people understand the tendencies of gentlemen on the other side. Now, this cool, calm, deliberate, assassination of the law will not be tolerated. We have had a winter to freeze out our passion, we have had a summer to thaw out our indifference, we have had the changing circles of the year to bring us around to order and calmness, and yet all the stars in their courses seem to have shed their influence on my colleague to fire him with a more desperate madness and drive his party on to a still sadder fate. [Applause on the republican side.]

I trust and believe that we may yet find some responses from the other side of the House that will prevent this course of procedure. If we do, I will gladly give away any party advantage for the sake of strengthening the foundations of law and good order. And I therefore appeal to gentlemen on the other side to prevent a disaster which their party leaders are preparing, not for themselves alone, but for our common country. I hope before this day is over we may see such a vote in this Chamber upon this bill as will put an end to this miserable business, and cast out of these halls the dregs of that unfortunate and crazy extra session. [Applause on the republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes of the time allotted to that side of the House still remains.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will reserve the ten minutes to be used hereafter.

Mr. McMAHON. No; that cannot be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, then, I will yield the ten minutes remaining to my friend from Michigan.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to engage in this discussion. To my mind, indeed, debate is useless. All appeal to the majority is futile. After listening to the remarkable declarations of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] in the opening of this discussion, there can be no question but that it is the deliberate, deep-seated purpose of the democratic party to nullify such laws as they disapprove but cannot repeal.

You propose to permit this law requiring the appointment of special deputy marshals to stand upon the statute-book, enjoining upon the President the duty of executing such law, make him amenable to impeachment if he does not enforce it, and at the same time withhold from him the means to carry it into execution. United States marshals when properly applied to are charged with the duty of appointing special deputy marshals, but when that duty is performed and these deputies are appointed, you propose to withhold their compensation.

Now, sir, what is the meaning of all this? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] expressly declares that it is the purpose of the democratic party not only to withhold the $7,600 due the special deputy marshals of California for services rendered last fall, but it is their intention also not to appropriate a solitary dollar to carry out the election laws in so far as they provide for special deputy marshals in the great political contest of 1880. We are to elect a President of the United States, we are to fill every seat in this Chamber, and you decline to permit the use of special deputy marshals during this struggle. Why are you anxious to dispense with their services? Does the law enjoin upon special deputy marshals the commission of any wrong? What are their duties? Why, sir, they are required to aid and assist the supervisors in the verification of the registry list. The law enjoins it. The Supreme Court have pronounced that law constitutional. Yet the democratic party declare they will not appropriate a dollar for such inspection. Do you desire a fraudulent list? They shall attend at the time and place for the registration of voters and see that such registration is fair. The law requires it. The Supreme Court has declared it constitutional. Yet you say you will not appropriate a dollar for such a purpose. Do you desire an unfair registration? They shall attend at the registration when those unlawfully registered are marked for challenge. The law enforces this duty. The Supreme Court declares this constitutional, yet you decline to appropriate a dollar for that purpose. Do you desire illegal voters to go unchallenged? They shall be in attendance at the polls on election day. The law commands it. The Supreme Court of the United States pronounces such law constitutional. Yet you declare you will make no appropriation for such purpose? Do you object to their presence? They are to keep the peace at the polls on election day. The law compels it; and, although the democratic party at the extra session declared that there was no peace of the United States to be preserved, yet the Supreme Court affirms that there is a peace of the United States to be maintained, and that the United States may preserve the peace at the polls. Yet the democratic party will appropriate nothing for such a purpose. Do you want disorder at the polls? They are to protect and support the supervisors in the discharge of all their duty. The law requires it. The Supreme Court approves it. Yet you declare there shall be no appropriation for such a purpose. Do you want them unprotected?

They are to prevent fraudulent registration, fraudulent voting, and fraudulent counting by officers of elections. The Supreme Court of the United States declares all these provisions constitutional. Yet you will appropriate no money to prevent stuffing ballot-boxes or the dishonest counting of ballots. Do you desire a fraudulent vote? They are authorized to arrest the violators of law seeking to overthrow the will of the people. This is their duty under the law. This law is constitutional. Yet the democratic party decline to appropriate a dollar for such arrests. Do you want these criminals to go unarrested and unpunished? It looks like it.

In view of the declaration of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] I have this to say in conclusion, and this only: that I believe this to be a part of the great scheme of the democratic party to obtain complete control of the Government. I believe it to be the determination of that party to seize this Government at all hazards, whatever may be the result of this fall's elections; that it is their purpose not only not to pay the expenses already incurred for special deputies, or make provision for such officers in the future, but should special deputies be employed without appropriation therefor, in any of the States in the approaching elections, the electoral vote of such State will not be counted.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. If they can help it.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir, if they can prevent it. The democratic majority has found its way into this Hall by the light of burning homes and blazing churches—over murdered but unburied dead, and its bloody foot-prints stain the very steps of this Capitol. By this means you have secured both branches of Congress. Now, the Presidency is to be attained. But how? Nullify the election laws, you say. Give us free fraud and no special deputy marshals to detect us in our crimes or arrest our criminals and we will carry States enough in the North to consummate our purpose. You are determined to hold both branches of Congress and secure the Presidency. Let me warn you, gentlemen, that if you adhere to this policy of nullification you will do neither. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman's words have no effect, coming as they do from a party which holds the Presidency by having stolen the votes of two or three States in the Union. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Anybody who succeeds in stealing from the democratic party is entitled to a pension. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Gentlemen who appropriated the benefits of the victory stolen at the last election are not the ones to rise up here and talk about honesty in elections.

Mr. WILBER. That only shows the democratic party was not smart.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, the third party commands peace in this Hall. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I like to hear the other side begin to talk about honesty in elections, but I must confess I should like to hear the cry come from those who had not practiced fraud in the past.

Mr. REED. Just wait until the chairman of the Committee on Elections gets to work in his proper office.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side of the House should have arranged their programme a little better. The oily gentleman from Ohio, my distinguished colleague—

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope my friend is not now speaking autobiographically.

Mr. McMAHON. I am speaking of my colleague; the only gentleman from Ohio who deserves that appellation. He should have arranged his programme better. He should have had the gentleman who came behind him and those who preceded better trained, when he made his paternal appeal to the democratic party and the democratic members of the House, imploring them not to throw away all chance of the next presidential election by being such naughty boys. We were all touched by his great anxiety for our political welfare. But the other gentlemen offered such direct insults to members on this floor and to the democratic party as a party—and they are insults because they are base falsehoods—as to lead us to doubt the sincerity of all. Almost in the same breath in which my colleague appeals to us to abandon our position upon the question of deputy marshals of election, we are denounced by his associates as a majority who owe our seats to blood and whose footsteps into power are tracked in burning homes; yet we are invited to abandon our position, to take up our abode among republicans and to suck the dugs of the “wolves” on the other side of the House. [Applause on the democratic side.]

There was only one great man raised in that way, and I have not read of any other in history.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think they were twins, Romulus and Remus. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. McMAHON. My colleague will allow me to correct him. Only one of them was great. History speaks only of Romulus as a “great” man.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Remus was there, though.

Mr. McMAHON. I wish in all good faith to ask my colleague from Ohio, who has read us all, and me particularly, a lecture, why it is that on every political proposition upon which he undertakes to alarm the country and lecture the democratic party we find that in the past he advocated the very propositions we now make and pursued the very course which he now pretends so much to reprobate? Why is it? Will my colleague look to the history of the republican party in the country, and particularly in the State of Ohio, with its long record of nullification on the question of the Dred Scott decision and the fugitive-slave law? [Laughter on the republican side.] Gentlemen on the other side are amused. Why? Do they object to my reference to those days? Is it because the republican party was then only in its infancy and that it pleads minority for what it did then? In those days actual resistance to the enforcement of the law was one of the cardinal points of the majority of the republican party, a policy we have never advocated nor practiced nor indorsed.

Or, do gentlemen claim that the great public men of their party in that day were unsound statesmen, dangerous to the country and enemies to the Government? The judgment of an impartial public would be to-day in favor of the republican leaders of twenty years ago in preference to those of to-day.

When the record of gentlemen has been so different in the past from their present position, on the questions of the effect of decisions of the Supreme Court, the supremacy of Federal law, and riders to appropriation bills, are we to look upon them as reformed statesmen? Does my colleague desire to appear in that rôle? Has my colleague seen the error of his ways? Has he become convinced that in those days he and his party was wrong? Are you willing, gentlemen, to admit that to the country now? Or are we to draw the proper conclusion that you can change your side as the necessities and emergencies of party demand? In 1860 the republican party was as powerful, as strong, as brainy, as full of great leaders, and as intent upon great purposes as it ever was in the history of this country; indeed, more so; for it had not then been debauched as it has been since by the unlimited possession of power; it had not been corrupted by the handling of millions or rather of thousands of millions of the public money without accountability except to itself. It was then a party for the equal rights of men; a party which a man might well respect although he might not agree with it in its aims and purposes. In those days one of the corner-stones of the party was placed in the Chicago platform of 1860:

That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of powers on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends; and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes.

A similar enunciation of doctrine to-day, by any democrat, would be denounced as hatred of the Federal Union and hostility to the Federal Government. Will you admit that in 1860 you were for the rights of the States because you possessed a majority of the State governments, and were not in possession of the Federal Government? Do you admit that you were wrong then but right now? I leave gentlemen to decide that before the American people. A party which can maintain both sides of the same important question, with equal vigor, depending only upon where its party interests may temporarily lie, is not well qualified for the position of monitor to any other party, nor are its teachings deserving of the attention of a serious people.

Mr. Chairman, the ingenuity with which our friends on the other side evade the discussion of all economical questions that look to the real interests of the people is remarkable. When the Belknap investigation was first ordered the cry went all over the country that the “rebel brigadiers” were assailing an honest Union soldier who had helped to put the rebellion down; and, although he was proven to have been guilty beyond all controversy, republicans did all in their power to protect him. This is only one instance in the past. When we have now under discussion the question of how much money shall be appropriated for the Printing Office—because the Public Printer has violated law in using up in eight months an appropriation intended for the whole fiscal year—when we discover that the appropriations for that department, if voted as the demands of the office now require, will make an increased expenditure of $400,000 over former years, when charges of extravagance, inattention to public interests, squandering of the people's money are made, how are we met? Why the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] rises, and, in his dilettant way, says that he will not waste any time on the discussion of the Printing Office. That seems to him to be only a matter of a few hundred thousand dollars to the American people! I suppose, in view of the history of his party, he considers such a deficiency a very small matter. Perhaps it is. But it is the mission of the democratic party at this time—and for that reason it has been kept in power—to look into the expenditure of the money of the people, no matter how small, and save wherever we can, no matter how small the sum may be.

This purpose of the democratic party to economize expenditures and expose the extravagance of the Administration cannot be evaded by side issues. It does gentlemen no good to undertake at this late day to flaunt the bloody shirt before the American people. It might do, Mr. Chairman, in the days when our people were distressed, when men were out of employment, when there was no work to do, when our manufacturing establishments were stopped, when every interest and industry in the country were paralyzed, as the result of the policy of the party of gentlemen on the other side. But now if men are out of employment it is simply because the exigency of the occasion authorizes them to demand an increase of 10 or 20 per cent. over the wages of hard times. I say to gentlemen on the other side when they come before the American people with that same worn-out, tattered, faded, bloody shirt, they mistake the temper of the American people. They will find that the people will put the seal of condemnation on that party which inaugurates these sectional discussions, tending to disturb the business of the country and to increase discord between the two sections.

The business of the country demands quiet, and the people will have peace. Who teach the rising generation that they should hate their fellow-countrymen? If you put into the hands of the boys of our day the speeches of republican politicians, they are taught that their natural enemies lie in the South, and the seeds of future civil wars are planted by designing politicians for a mere temporary party advantage. Is this statesman-like? Is this taking a broad view of the present needs of our country? Is it patriotic to foment divisions at home, to perpetuate sectional hatred, to weaken our country by intestine quarrels?

Oh, I wish there was a statesman upon the other side. [Laughter on the republican side.] I hope gentlemen will permit me to finish my sentence. I know that we are all apt to imagine ourselves to be statesmen, and therefore gentlemen rebel when I seem to take away the right from any of them. I was going to qualify my statement, if gentlemen had given me time. There are statesmen on the other side of the House. I am not disputing that proposition, either as to my friend from Maine, or my colleague from Ohio. I was about to say to you what kind of statesmen I wish you had on the republican side. I wish you had a statesman who was able to rise above fomenting all this petty political strife between the North and the South. I wish you had a statesman who would wave the banner of peace, as the President did, for a while, until resistance in his own party became too powerful. I wish there was one who could overlook the past and let this country prepare itself for the great difficulties through which it may have to pass in the next few years. They are difficulties growing out of our increasing greatness.

There are gentlemen on both sides of the House exceedingly anxious to pass decided resolutions on the subject of the interoceanic canal. It is proposed that we shall lay down on that subject a doctrine which may involve this country in an unequivocal assertion of its rights, and lead us no man can tell where. It is proper for us to consider the situation. Are we preparing ourselves, in fomenting civil discord at home, to proclaim the act of any foreign nation setting foot on any portion of the soil of this continent as a declaration of war?

What must the people and the rulers of other countries think when they see our so-called leaders, or those who claim to be such, endeavoring to keep alive sectional hate? If the people of this country want to learn any lesson rapidly it is that we are becoming not only the great power on this continent but a standing menace to the world. The success of our free institutions is a constant argument against the despotism of the Old World. Our products, our commerce, and our manufactures have almost brought Great Britain to her knees. Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that this can long be the case without forcing some combination against us? And is our country to be benefited by the appearance of division at home? Are we likely to have continued peace if we proclaim to foreign nations that we are divided; that one half of our people are against the Government; that there is no peace between the North and the South, even though the war has been over for fifteen years?

A party that foments and proclaims these internal divisions and troubles, and asserts that one-half of this country means to overthrow this Government, only invites an attack which some day sooner or later will come from the combined forces of foreign governments. In what position will we then be? Read the reports of your Government officers, and they will tell you that in Boston Harbor there is not a single gun which can keep out the iron-clads of Europe; that the harbor of New York is in the same condition; that there is not a harbor in the United States into which the iron-clads of Great Britain, of France, and of Spain cannot go and take possession of your cities.

In the midst of these possible dangers, in the midst of the prosperity of our country, in the midst of the increase of business, in the midst of a desire on the part of the people to bury all sectional issues, when we ought to be shouting pæans for our prosperity, and uniting in common energy that nothing shall retard it, the republican politician comes to the front with his shouts of hatred to the South, his denunciation of the democratic party as an enemy to the country, as intending to seize the Government by force, if not duly elected by the people; and as proof of his assertion and the propriety of his hate he points to the remarkable fact that his pet special deputy marshals of elections who controlled the polls in San Francisco are not to be paid the $7,600 which is said to be due them.

The attempt to unsettle the confidence of the people is atrocious. If successful it would paralyze business everywhere. And the pretense that the democratic party intends to seize upon the Government under all circumstances comes with a bad grace from a party which robbed us once of our rights and seems disposed to do so again. Our submission to law is proven by the peaceful inauguration as President of one who was not actually chosen by the people.

Now, sir, there is nothing in this bill which in any way prevents the full execution of the election laws to their fullest extent; nothing to prevent general deputy marshals from doing duty at the polls; nothing to prevent a United States marshal from appointing as many general deputy marshals as he pleases at any future election, or to prevent the marshals or their general deputies from arresting on election day as many persons as they please and carrying them before commissioners where they can be tried. How, then, do we nullify these laws? We simply say that we will not give $7,600 to pay your special deputy marshals in California because you had no authority to appoint them when no money was appropriated for that purpose. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] is the advocate of a very distinguished gentleman for the Presidency, [Mr. Sherman.] I violate no confidence in saying this, because he has gone upon the record in the public prints. Let me read to him, as a complete answer to a portion of his argument, from a celebrated document issued by his candidate for the Presidency since he has been Secretary of the Treasury. During the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress he sent a communication to us in which is to be found the following:

The seventh section of the act of July 12, 1870, (Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 251; Revised Statutes, section 3679,) provides that no department of the government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations. Prior to that time acts of Congress had been passed which expressly or constructively imposed upon the executive department of the government duties involving the expenditure of money for which no appropriations had been made, and from the existence of those duties it was inferred that the power to incur the necessary debts also existed.

To cut off all such inferences and assumptions was the evident purpose of the section of law referred to. (See 14 Opinions Attorneys-General, page 109.)

I give that to the gentleman as a complete answer to his argument. He has claimed that when a marshal is called upon to appoint special deputy marshals he is bound to do so in compliance with the law, although no appropriation has been made for the purpose. I refer him to his candidate for the Presidency, who says that if no appropriation has been made for that purpose, then the duty imposed upon the officer does not exist, and he is not liable for a failure to perform it.

The gentleman did me much honor in alluding to me as the leader of the House upon this bill, or as one of the leaders of the House. I confess that if I were to take to myself the estimate that gentlemen upon the other side put upon me just now I might entertain an improper idea of the position which I occupy on this floor. I make and have made no pretensions to leadership. I am assigned to the duty of pushing this bill through the House; and I am only authorized to speak for the committee so far as their actions allow.

I do not understand that I speak for anybody except in the official way that I represent the Appropriations Committee. I call my distinguished colleague's attention to the fact that in commenting upon what I said he left out a part of the sentence which he undertook to quote. I will read from the RECORD exactly what I did say:

We do not in this bill appropriate any money for special deputy marshals; and I doubt whether the democratic party ever will appropriate any money for such special deputies so long as the law stands in its present shape.

Did my colleague read that? He did not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I said to the Chair that I would print in full the passage referred to.

Mr. McMAHON. That is the whole passage.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, it is not all I am going to quote; I shall quote three or four times as much.

Mr. McMAHON. I appeal to the House as witnesses that all that I said upon this subject was—and I will read again from the RECORD:

We do not in this bill appropriate any money for special deputy marshals; and I doubt whether the democratic party will ever appropriate any money for such special deputies so long as the law stands in its present shape.

I hope the House will observe the care with which I expressed myself.

It would have been very easy for my colleague to have quoted me correctly. He could not read what I had said without seeing the qualification. It was a part of the same sentence. Why did he prefer not to quote me correctly? Why did he fail to quote the words "so long as the law stands in its present shape?" Does he prefer to have his speech go to the country representing me in the flaming way in which he put it instead of my own language?

Mr. GARFIELD. Will my colleague allow me? Everybody in the House knows that I said I would not stop to read the extract, but would print in full what I referred to, from the RECORD.

Mr. McMAHON. Why did not my colleague repeat on the floor what I had said?

Mr. GARFIELD. Everybody heard me say that.

Mr. McMAHON. I propose to hold the distinguished gentleman to a strict accountability when he builds the fabric of a whole speech upon something I have said. All I did say upon that particular point was what I have read; and if the gentleman's argument does not apply to that he had better "withhold his speech for revision" and leave the whole of it out.

Now, I want to say to the gentleman again that the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided a particular law to be constitutional is no reason why Congress shall be denounced as a nullifier because it fails to appropriate money under that particular law. What did the Supreme Court decide? Merely that the election laws are constitutional; that it was within the ordinary power of Congress to pass such laws. Did the Supreme Court decide that they were good laws? Did it decide that it is the duty of Congress to appropriate money to carry them out? Did the court decide that they are laws which ought to be carried out? By no means. I call for the reading of anything in the Supreme Court decision putting any obligation upon us in regard to that matter.

I want to go a little further. My colleague says that we ought to appropriate money for this purpose in the future. It would not be proper on this bill; but if it was, how much? Five thousand dollars? Gentlemen will say that is not enough, and we are nullifiers still. Ten thousand dollars? They will say that is not enough, and we are still nullifiers. Twenty thousand dollars? They will say that is not enough, and we are nullifiers in spite of the amount voted. The fact is, we are always to be called nullifiers unless we meet the views of the republican party.

Congress, Mr. Chairman, holds it in its own power to say for what purposes it will appropriate the public money. We are the judges; the Constitution leaves it with us only. It would be very foolish for us to appropriate money for an unconstitutional law, because in attempting to carry it out the country would be involved in confusion. But there are plenty of laws upon the statute-book that are constitutional, for which Congress fails as a matter of fact to appropriate money. Now I do not speak for the democratic party and have not spoken for that party, having no authority to do so; but I repeat what I said before, that I doubt whether the democratic party ever will vote to pay $5 a day to special deputy marshals so long as the law stands in its present shape.

Mr. GARFIELD. To save any question, if my colleague will allow me, I would like to ask him whether he is in favor of executing the election laws?

Mr. McMAHON. Let me read as an answer from my speech of the other day.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman could say "yes" or "no" it would make the matter very short.

Mr. McMAHON. Let me read again as my answer what my colleague failed to read when he was commenting upon my speech:

We do not in this bill appropriate any money for special deputy marshals; and I doubt whether the democratic party will ever appropriate any money for such special deputies so long as the law stands in its present shape.

Is the gentleman answered? That expresses my views.

Mr. GARFIELD. That merely expresses the gentleman's "doubt." I ask him whether he is in favor of carrying out the election law?

Mr. McMAHON. I have no hesitation in saying to the gentleman that so far as I am concerned, while the law stands in its present shape, I am not in favor of voting money for special deputies; but I will tell the gentleman something more in the same connection. Before this Congress adjourns gentlemen on the other side may be met with a proposition which will test their sincerity as to a modification of these laws. They may be met with a proposition to amend the law so that two deputy marshals may be appointed for each polling place—one to belong to each political party.

Mr. WEAVER. Three.

Mr. McMAHON. Wherever the greenbackers can make any showing, let them have one. [Laughter.] The proposition may be made that these two or three officers shall be appointed, not by the United States marshals, but by the judges of the courts of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman then favor appropriations to pay them?

Mr. McMAHON. I want to get your side committed first; you are the refractory men as to the amendment of the law.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman then favor appropriations to pay these officers?

Mr. CALKINS. Where a county has a democratic sheriff, I suppose the gentleman will also favor giving us half the deputy sheriffs.

Mr. McMAHON. A sheriff is not a political officer; a special deputy marshal, as we have found, is nothing more nor less than a mere political appointee and general party agent. He is only appointed for an election and then goes out of existence.

Now, when gentlemen on the other side are willing to give us a proposition like that, with a reduced pay and a reduced term of service, and ask us to appropriate money for these officers, we will meet them in the proper spirit and discuss the matter; but we want the change of the law and the appropriation to go together. But so long as gentlemen have and exercise the unlimited power to appoint in any city of twenty thousand inhabitants an unlimited number of United States special deputy marshals from the rough scum of the rabble, at $5 a day, and for a period of ten days, and thereby debauch elections, so long they cannot expect us to put the money of the Government into their hands to be used for mere partisan purposes. You may call the election laws laws for the protection of the ballot-box. Under republican management they have been corruptly and wrongfully used.

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague will remember that we offered last session to let the law be changed so that these officers should be appointed from the two parties. I distinctly held that out as a standing offer; and, so far as I am concerned, that "lamp still holds out to burn."

Mr. McMAHON. We may give the gentleman a chance to vote for such a proposition; and when I say "we" I mean "I," for I disclaim speaking for the democratic party. But that is a question for the future, and I want it tested in all fairness and sincerity. The immediate proposition we are considering is that whether we will vote $7,600 to pay the special deputy marshals in California. Gentlemen on the other side say we ought to vote it. Who on that side say that it is a debt or obligation? What Department asks us to vote it? What Department is willing to assume the responsibility of having incurred that as a debt? No Department has asked us; and I appeal to my friend from California whether those men have not been paid out of private funds.

Mr. PAGE. No; they have not been paid.

Mr. McMAHON. On your honor?

Mr. PAGE. On my honor, so far as I know, they have not been paid. They were appointed with the distinct understanding there was no appropriation, and they have left it to the honor of the House to make the appropriation.

Mr. McMAHON. I want to say to the gentleman this House does not appropriate money on "honor;" it appropriates money under law, and only to meet obligations and debts. The gentleman admits in the very proposition he has made to us there is no legal obligation. It is simply a question of honor with the American Congress, the gentleman admits, that we shall take $7,600 out of the Treasury to pay the expenses of a lot of republican or democratic dead-beats, hired to stand at the polls in the interest of the republican candidates for Congress. [Laughter and applause on the democratic side.] That is what it means; and that is all it does mean.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The honor of this Congress is to obey the law. Mr. McMAHON. There was no law authorizing this, because, as Secretary Sherman says in the letter I have already quoted, (and I want my friend to rub it well under his nose,) no Department can incur an obligation when no appropriation has been made for that specific purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Who says that?

Mr. McMAHON. Secretary Sherman.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Secretary Sherman is not a member of this House.

Mr. McMAHON. He is not; but is not the gentleman from Wisconsin going to support Secretary Sherman for the Presidency?

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is a leading question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILBER. It depends on whether he is nominated.

Mr. McMAHON. If I turn to that other man, who is running for a third term; if the gentleman will look to his message sent to Congress in June, 1876, he will find that he lays down the same law, that in the absence of an appropriation imperative executive duties cannot be performed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am for the third-term man, if you please. Certainly I am. And he will hold, as did Secretary Sherman, that when any obligation rests in this Congress, or any other body in the United States, which the law creates, they are to obey it and ask no questions.

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman did not hear me when I read from Secretary Sherman, who takes just the opposite ground and says if the appropriation has not been made there can be no debt or obligation incurred. That he said at the time when he was looking to the business interests of the country, and not looking, as my friend is, to some political harangue. The only chance my friend will have then, if he wants to have a candidate to carry out his doctrine, is to drop the man who wants the third term and turn the cold shoulder to the Secretary of the Treasury, and give his support to the statesman from Maine, a pretty good man indeed, who does not seem to have a record on this point.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I will be as much pleased to vote for Mr. Sherman or Mr. BLAINE, or for Mr. Grant; for whoever we nominate we are going to elect.

Mr. McMAHON. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. McMAHON. I yield, then, the balance of my time to my colleague, Mr. WARNER.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, the question raised in this bill is not whether laws are to be obeyed or violated, but whether, as legislators, we have the right to repeal or amend laws, or to direct how the revenues of the people shall be applied in the execution of the law. It is whether Congress has the right to say to what objects appropriations shall be directed, and whether, under any circumstances, it may withhold the appropriations of money from any object recognized by law, or from the execution of any law. The gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] in his argument yesterday on this question, admitted that circumstances might arise which would justify shutting off supplies from an obnoxious law; but the argument of my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] if it leads to anything, is to the position that a law once placed upon the statute-books is there not merely to be appropriated for but is in itself a perpetual appropriation of revenue; that the whole body of laws on the statute-books are there, not as calling merely for annual appropriations for their execution, but in and of themselves are a perpetual appropriation of the revenues of the people, and consequently a perpetual levy of taxes. If that be the case, then why go through the form of passing an appropriation bill in this House? Why not, as was asked by a distinguished member of this House a century ago, why not let the President make his drafts at once upon the Treasury? I say all laws stand upon the statute-books subject forever to the condition of periodical appropriations to be made by Congress under the Constitution.

The public revenue, Mr. Chairman, is that part of the annual produce of a people devoted to public uses.

Who shall say how much or how little shall be so applied; they who produce it or they who spend it? Every free people that have ever inhabited the earth, whether Hellenic, Roman, or Saxon, have held in their own hands this control. It is a right older than constitutional governments, older than the English-speaking race. Liberty has stood its ground only when wedded to this right, and when and where the people have held and used this power. By it the Anglo-Saxon race gained and preserved its liberties on English soil, and with the first colony, brought it to this side of the Atlantic.

Story says of the first Plymouth colony:

There was also an early declaration that no taxes could be levied by the governor without the consent of the general assembly.

Not only was the assent of the general assembly necessary to the levying of taxes, but the same authority say:

When raised, they were to be applied to the appointment of the legislature.

And of the first Connecticut colony he says:

Among other things it was declared that no tax could be levied but by the general court.

This right was carried forward as a fundamental principle in the Constitution, which provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." As early as 1797, Mr. Nicholls, a distinguished member of the House from Virginia, and a member of the State convention that adopted the Constitution, said:

The power of this House to control appropriations has been settled. It was indeed an absurdity to call a body a legislature, and at the same time deny them a control over the public purse. If it were not so, where would be the use of going through the forms of that House with a money bill? The Executive might as well draw upon the Treasury at once for whatever sums he might stand in need of. A doctrine like this would be scouted even in despotic countries.

Mr. Madison said:

The purse is in the hands of the representatives of the people. They have the appropriation of all moneys.

In the House of Representatives, February 25, 1797, Mr. Gallatin said he "conceived the power of granting money to be vested solely in the Legislature, and though, according to the opinion of some gentlemen (though not in his) the President and Senate could so bind the nation as to oblige the Legislature to appropriate money to carry a treaty into effect, yet, in other cases, he did not suppose there had been any doubt with respect to the power of the Legislature in this respect."

The exclusive power to originate revenue bills—which has always been construed to include appropriation bills—by express constitutional provision is given to the House, the immediate representatives of the people. The question has been often mooted whether to raise revenue includes also its application. But when we understand that the revenue raised is the part of the earnings of the people applied to purposes of government, that is, to public uses, it is by the plainest implication that the power that determines how much shall be so applied shall also determine how it shall be applied. It is for Congress alone to say not only—not merely—what taxes shall be levied, but how much money shall be appropriated for this object or that object, and how it shall or shall not be applied. All this is the business of Congress and not of the Executive.

De Lolme, in his Treatise on the English Constitution, says:

If any other persons besides the representatives of the people had a right to make an offer of the produce of the labor of the people, the executive power would soon have forgotten that it only exists for the advantage of the public.

In the reign of Henry IV, according to the same authority—

The house voted supplies to the Crown, but appointed treasurers of their own to see the money disbursed for the purpose intended, and required them to deliver in their accounts to the house; and from that period the supply was generally appropriated to specific purposes.

Not only was money appropriated for specific purposes, but in this case the House of Commons appointed its own treasurers to apply the money.

So late as 1861 Mr. Gladstone included all the chief financial propositions in one bill, thus depriving the House of Lords of the power of amendment in detail, and so carried it.

I say all the other constitutional guarantees the people of this country have are nothing compared with this one great right, so jealously guarded by the English Commons.

The veto of bills, then, on the ground that provisions are annexed directing how appropriations of money shall be applied, would be an assumption of power on the part of the Executive wholly inconsistent with the fundamental principles of our Government and of all free government. Congress alone has control of the purse. And it will be a sad day when the people of this country surrender that control or submit to executive dictation in the matters of appropriation.

Congress may, and it may be its duty not only to reduce both revenues and appropriations, but to withhold altogether an appropriation for the time being from an object deemed detrimental to public welfare. This is a constitutional right. It is a kind of reserved power vested in the representatives of the people, not wholly unlike the veto power in the hands of the President. Take the case before us. A majority in Congress have sought the repeal of certain laws; the President interposes his veto, as is his right; then, exercising its constitutional right, Congress withholds money from the specific object in controversy. For the time being the operation of the law is thereby suspended, or, to use the expression of another, that ship is grounded. The issue goes to the people; they alone can say whether taxes shall be levied and the money appropriated and the law put in operation again or be repealed. There is no revolution here; no semblance of revolution. There is no violation of law or of the oath of legislators. It is a constitutional way of reaching a solution of differences between co-ordinate branches of the Government. This view has been uniformly held by the most distinguished republican leaders until that party came in the minority in this House. And, by some, the doctrine was pushed even to unwarrantable extremes. Mr. Fessenden, in 1867, said:

The power of supply and the power of annexing conditions of supply have always gone together in parliamentary history, and their joint exercise has never been denounced as a case of revolution, or calling for revolution, or tending to produce revolution in any shape or form whatever. It is a power essential to the preservation of our liberties.

In 1866 the following provision was annexed to the diplomatic appropriation bill:

And no money shall be paid to the present minister resident at Portugal, out of any funds whatever, on account of further services in his office.

In the debate in the Senate on this provision in the bill, the following year, Mr. Sumner, than whom no one was more competent to speak for his party or to lay down the principles of constitutional government, said, (page 1501, Globe of February 18, 1867):

It will be remembered that during the last session Congress in its appropriation bill provided that nothing should be paid to the minister at that time in Portugal, under any appropriation bill or out of any fund whatever.

Now the question may arise whether Congress in taking that step went beyond the line of its constitutional duty. I take it nobody will suggest that it did. I believe one of the best principles—I might almost say one of the golden principles—of constitutional law—

I call special attention of the other side to this golden principle of constitutional law—is that, the parliamentary power, having control of the purse, may in that way influence public policy in the appointment of officers.

This is surely high republican authority, although the last vote of the great statesman was given for the democratic candidate for President.

Mr. Fessenden said, (Globe, July 25, 1866, pages 3957, 3958:)

It is very right and very proper that, in a case that justifies it, Congress should exercise the power that it has, and that is, when a public officer is obnoxious and Congress is satisfied that retaining him in his place is injurious to the public interest or the public honor, it should exercise the power it has and refuse to appropriate for the payment of his salary whatever it may be. That is a power that Congress possesses, and in a proper case it is perfectly right for it to exercise it. It is a check that it has, that the Constitution intended it should have.

Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, said:

I agree with the Senator from Maine that, where a proper occasion arises, it is not only right but it may be the duty of Congress to make no appropriations to pay salaries.

In another part of the debate on the same question Mr. Sumner said:

The only question before us now is whether we can, so far as this minister is concerned, refuse all appropriations.

There I believe the rule is clear and absolutely beyond question. If it were not clear and absolutely beyond question, I think that Congress would be shorn of one of its best powers. It is no answer to say that it is a power that in our history has been rarely exercised, for the occasion for its exercise happily has been very rare; but Congress has exercised it now, and I submit that it is a power beyond question. It was a power, as the Senator from Maine has reminded you, recognized in English history. It was perfectly familiar to the framers of the Constitution of the United States, for it had been proclaimed in a work of authority which had been read at that time by all of our fathers. I hold in my hand the work of De Lolme on the British constitution, from which, with your permission, I will read a few words, for they seem to settle this constitutional question. I read as follows:

I give the part quoted from De Lolme by Mr. Sumner with his comments:

The King of England, therefore, has the prerogative of commanding armies and equipping fleets, but without the concurrence of his Parliament he cannot maintain them.

Then Sumner continues:

Just the same as our President has the power of commanding armies and of equipping fleets; but what can he do without the power of Congress?

De Lolme then goes on:

"He can bestow places and emoluments."

[Mr. SUMNER.] So can the President—

"but without his Parliament he cannot pay the salaries attending on them."

[Mr. SUMNER.] Is not the position of Congress in this regard at least as high as that of the British Parliament?

Then De Lolme says:

"In a word, the royal prerogative, destitute as it is of the power of imposing taxes, is like a vast body which cannot of itself accomplish its motion, or, if you please, it is like a ship completely equipped, but from which the Parliament can at pleasure draw off the water and leave it aground, and also set it afloat again by granting subsidies."

Then Mr. Sumner says:

Now, all that Congress proposes to do at this moment, so far as I understand, is, according to the language of this writer, to draw off the water and leave the ship aground.

This was quoted in part by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] at the extra session. This illustrates well the case before us. Congress refuses to appropriate money for special deputy marshals to control elections. The water is drawn off, and the deputy-marshals law is left for the time being aground.

Mr. CONGER. Do I understand the gentleman to argue that Congress has the right to withhold any or all appropriations and let the old Ship of State go down to the bottom?

Mr. WARNER. I will answer the gentleman's question by first quoting further from the opinions of distinguished members of his own party. In a debate on the Army bill, in the Thirty-fourth Congress, Mr. Wade, Senator from Ohio, taking more extreme ground, said:

Must the people's House of Representatives sit with their arms folded, and although the Constitution of the United States confers emphatically upon them the power to originate all revenue bills (which comprises the power to place these grants of money on such conditions as they see fit,) must they refrain from exercising their authority in an emergency like this? Is this the liberty of the American citizen, that the people's House, where there really is a representation of the people, where the wisdom of the fathers placed the taxing power, are leading to revolution by annexing a condition to the appropriation of the people's money, a most wholesome restraint, putting a curb in the mouth of the traitor who sits in the executive chair, now stimulating this country as fast as he can do it to civil war?

John P. Hale, of New Hampshire, said:

Mr. President, I understand this principle to be the great principle of English liberty incorporated in our Constitution, and it is the only resource by which the Parliament of Great Britain have held the king in check. If we surrender it we shall give our own Executive an arbitrary power unknown to the Constitution, and not vested in the King of England. It is the only principle that is left of popular government by which the supremacy of the popular will can be maintained in this country or in England, and if we give it up to-day, we may just as well give up the experiment.

Joshua R. Giddings spoke in the same way:

I take the position which I have always maintained here for myself, and which I am unwilling in the midst of passing events to leave unproclaimed on this floor, and that is that the people have a perfect, unlimited control of their own funds. We are the representatives of the people here. We are their agents, sent here to deal out their funds, and it is not for the Senate or for the Executive to say that we shall appropriate them for any object revolting to the proper sense of justice and propriety. I lay down this as a principle too old and too well understood to be disputed at this day.

Mr. Seward, recognized by all parties as a statesman of high rank, said :

Since the House of Representatives has power to pass such a bill distinctly, it has power, also, to place an equivalent prohibition in any bill which it has constitutional power to pass. And so it has a constitutional right to place the prohibition in the annual Army appropriation bill.

I grant that this mode of reaching the object proposed is in some respects an unusual one, and in some respects an inconvenient one. It is not, therefore, however, an unconstitutional one, or even necessarily a wrong one.

It is a right one if it is necessary to effect the object desired, and if that object is one that is in itself just and eminently important to the peace and happiness of the country or to the security of the liberties of the people.

Mr. Wilson, afterward Vice-President, went so far as to step even on the dangerous ground so bitterly condemned now by the other side of the House, and which I also in part condemn. Mr. Wilson says :

"The House of Representatives," says Mr. Madison, "cannot only refuse, but they alone can propose the supplies requisite for the support of the Government." This declaration is full, ample, complete. If the House can refuse the supplies requisite for the support of the Government, if it possesses this complete and effective weapon for obtaining a redress of every grievance and for carrying into effect every just and salutary measure, the occasion surely demands the full exercise of that power of the House ; and in its firm exercise, to use the words of Madison, it will be sustained by the consciousness of being supported in its demands by right, by reason, and by the Constitution.

But this doctrine of the redress of grievances involves different principles from those connected with the control of revenues and the direction of expenditures to or away from special objects.

The doctrine of the redress of grievances borrowed from England I do not indorse. I have heretofore declared that it is a doctrine that finds no place in our system of government. The President has no power to redress grievances. That power was never given to him. He has no powers but those which the people have intrusted to him, power to execute the laws. These powers the people can enlarge or abridge, or they can abolish the office altogether by amendments to the Constitution. On this point Judge Story has laid down, as I believe, the true doctrine. He says :

Strictly speaking, in our republican forms of government, the absolute sovereignty of the nation is in the people of the nation ; and the residuary sovereignty of each State, not granted to any of its public functionaries, is in the people of the State.

To ask a redress of grievances at the hands of the Executive is therefore an admission of weakness on the one hand, and a suggestion of power on the other that does not comport with the organic structure of our Government. Where the "divine right of kings" is acknowledged ; where the powers of government descend by inheritance through one person, and reside in a single head, the people, theoretically at least, possess only such rights and liberties as their ruler may graciously bestow on them, or they may compel him to recognize or secure to them, by refusing him money to carry on his government. There, the doctrine of redress of grievances is consistent and of practical force. King James II said :

I will make no concessions ; my father made concessions and he was beheaded.

But though James made no concessions, for his refusal he lost his throne. But where the people themselves are the source of all power this doctrine is inconsistent. The differences between our own and foreign governments, where inherited powers are recognized, are wide as the poles.

I hold, however, Mr. Chairman, that it is as much the duty of Congress when the law is once recognized to appropriate for it as it is for the Executive to administer the appropriation when made. On this point I agree with the eminent author of a recent able treatise on "Politics as a Science," Mr. Reemelin, of Cincinnati, when he says :

To refuse appropriations arbitrarily for partisan purposes, after its object is recognized by law, is dereliction of duty.

Government is entitled to support, as the same author says, "from the law-making as from the executive power. An appropriation is not an act of grace vouchsafed to the Executive ; it is the discharge of a duty." This principle has been recognized by all democratic leaders, from Jefferson and Jackson down.

But there may be circumstances when it would not only become the right but the duty of this House, exercising its functions as representatives of the people, to hold for them the control of their earnings and their revenues and to say whether they shall be appropriated for this object or for that, how much for one and how much for another. And I can conceive circumstances, Mr. Chairman, under which I would vote to withhold appropriations from the whole Army ; if, for instance, some usurper—some man in the presidential chair, some Caesar or Napoleon—should attempt to make use of it to overthrow the liberties of the people, turning it against the people themselves, I would then most assuredly draw off the water—that is, cut off the supplies—and leave him aground, anchor him as quick as it was possible to do it. And the people themselves under such circumstances, through their Representatives in Congress, would have the right to use this reserved power in self-defense. I say, too, when the people surrender this power they surrender free government.

While, therefore, I uphold the right of this House, as the immediate representatives of the people, to increase or diminish taxes, to increase or diminish appropriations, and to direct to what objects money appropriated shall be applied, and to withhold it from specific objects, if it shall see fit, I make a broad distinction between this right, between this exercise of power, and the right to refuse supplies for legitimate purposes ; for the necessary and proper objects of government as a means of coercing a co-ordinate branch of the Government to give its assent to either the repeal or the enactment of a law. If Congress may rightly and constitutionally withhold appropriations necessary to support the executive department of Government in order to compel the Executive to concede some privilege, or concur in some measure, then it may withhold the means necessary to support the judicial department of the Government for the purpose of compelling judicial sanction of a law, or from the minority in Congress as a means of controlling their action. The logical conclusion to which such a doctrine leads is, that Congress, or one branch of Congress, has the constitutional power to subordinate to its own will a co-ordinate branch of the Government. Such doctrine, I maintain, was never taught by democrats recognized as leaders since the party had an existence. It is utterly opposed to all the settled principles of democratic government. To attempt to carry out such a doctrine would be revolution, or rather it would be nihilism scarcely less dangerous than that which hangs over Russia now.

On the other hand it will not do to say that a law once passed must necessarily be appropriated for each and every year thereafter for ever. Laws themselves are sometimes left to become obsolete. They may be perverted, or become obnoxious, or used as a means of tyranny. Or suppose a law is passed providing for a public building. Must Congress levy taxes and appropriate money for it every year, no matter what the reasons may be for stopping it ? There might be cases where vested rights come in, but there is no such question in the case before us.

Applying these principles to the bill before us, and believing as I do that every dollar appropriated for deputy marshals to go to the polls, as the law now stands—if money were appropriated for that purpose—would be used for partisan purposes, and not for the public good—used to corrupt the ballot and set aside the will of the people—I think the case is one, using the figure of De Lolme and Sumner, that justifies the drawing off of the water and leaving that law aground until the people decide the question. And I have no fears myself as to how they will decide this question when, divested of all other issues, it is clearly presented to them.

I do not propose to go over the ground or repeat the discussions of the extra session, but I cannot shut my eyes to the danger of permitting executive interference to penetrate to the ballot-box. That is the fountain-head of our system of government, and it must be left absolutely with the people. If they, acting in their sovereign capacity, cannot hold free and fair elections, then free government is a failure. I fear the encroachment of power there ; I am warned by the examples of history ; I am instructed by the admonition of the most far-seeing statesmen of the danger of relaxing constitutional safeguards. Macaulay utters a warning that it would be well to heed. He says :

As we cannot, without the risk of evils from which the imagination recoils, employ physical force as a check on misgovernment, it is evidently our wisdom to keep all the constitutional checks on misgovernment in the highest state of efficiency, to watch with jealousy the first beginnings of encroachment, and never to suffer irregularities, even when harmless in themselves, to pass unchallenged, lest they acquire the force of precedents.

Madison does the same when he says :

Since the general civilization of mankind I believe there are more instances of the abridgment of the freedom of the people by gradual and silent encroachments of those in power than by violent and sudden usurpations.

Patrick Henry said :

Show me that age and country where the rights and liberties of the people were placed on the sole chance of their rulers being good men, without a consequent loss of liberty.

And as indicating the marked decadence in the sentiment of the people—in the spirit of the age—as compared with a century ago, I give an extract from the Virginia Gazette, printed in 1769, which I fear has been almost lost to our history. I ask gentlemen to listen to an echo from Faneuil Hall, the old cradle of liberty, as reflected one hundred and eleven years ago from the home of Patrick Henry. I will call attention to the motto on the Gazette of that date : "Always for liberty and the public good." And on another copy of the same paper : "High Heaven to gracious ends directs the storms."

BOSTON, May 8, 1769.

Last Friday the freeholders and other inhabitants of this town, legally warned, met at Faneuil Hall and there made choice of the following gentlemen to represent them in the general assembly at the approaching session, the number of votes being 508 :

Hon. James Otis, Esq.....	502
Hon. Thomas Cushing, Esq.....	502
Mr. Samuel Adams.....	503
Mr. John Hancock.....	505

Previous to the above choice the following vote was passed, nemine contradicente, viz :

Voted, That the town, before they proceed upon the business of the day, do make, or order to be entered upon their records, the following declaration of their rights and freedom of their elections, viz :

The selectmen, having acquainted the town that they had waited on General Mackay, commander of His Majesty's forces quartered here, to inform him that the choice of persons to represent the town in the general assembly was coming on, and to claim in behalf of the town the full right of British freeholders and subjects upon so important an occasion, founded in the principles of the British constitution ; the selectmen having also acquainted the town that the general had declared that it was not in his power to march the troops out of the town upon this occasion, or any farther to comply with their claim than by confining the troops to their barracks, which he engaged to do. The town, though they receive this reply as a concession on the part of the general in favor of the justice of the claim, yet, as the measure of confining the troops in their barracks only, and not removing them out of town, is by no means adequate to the extent of their rights, they cannot proceed to the election without declaring their clear and full sense that the residence of an armed force in the town during an election of so great an importance is a gross infringement of their constitutional rights; at the same time protesting that their proceeding to an election under such circumstances is wholly from necessity, and not to be considered as a precedent at any time hereafter, or construed as a voluntary receding from the incontestable rights of British subjects and freeholders on so interesting an affair.

It was not long before this that Lord Bruce, in England, for uttering a single word by way of threat at an election, was marched up and down Westminster Hall in hose and doublet without his hat, and then sent to the Tower. "And fit it were," the old chronicler adds, "that these men (divers Yorkshire constables) for forestalling freedom of election and terrifying men with as much as a reminiscar, should go to the Tower."

In 1604 it was asserted in Parliament that the interference of a sheriff with an election would be tantamount to the disfranchisement of a town.

Mr. Chairman, in discussing this question I do not see the necessity or the pertinency of continually calling up the ghost of the war, as gentlemen seem so ready to do. Did the republicans of the North alone fight the battles of the war?

The two great parties in 1860, in the North, divided the people not unevenly, and, whatever opinions were held previously, when the war came on one sentiment animated all. I say all, for, although there were exceptions, they were few, even though some were noted. There were some on one side who said, "Let the erring brothers go," and on the other who opposed the war for the Union. But I say they were the exceptions. Democrats and republicans alike fell into ranks. Politics was for the time forgotten. What officer knew the politics of his men? And surely the democratic party gave to the country many of its most distinguished generals and other officers. Politics were not thought of in the Army. It was not talked about. What was it, I ask, that called forth the hardy manhood of the whole North? It was the deep conviction that with the Union broken asunder there would be an end of republican government on this continent. They knew that with two governments set up each must be strong to stand against the other. They knew the success of secession meant two despotisms—one over the grave of Washington, and one over the grave of Franklin.

It was to save the life of the Republic, to preserve free government, that democrats and republicans unitedly answered the call of President Lincoln. It was that noble sentiment, sunk deep in the hearts of all true soldiers, that supported them through the long years of the war; that sustained them in the hour of battle, on the weary march, in the midnight watch, and through the dreary hospital. Together they went to battle; together their blood flowed as from one fountain; together they met death, and together their bones lie mingled in common graves. The rich fruits of their sacrifices all now in common enjoy. And the time will come, must come, has come, I believe, when you gentlemen here who fought on the other side rejoice with us that the great Republic lives; that a common inheritance, left us by a common ancestry, was preserved. And I believe I but correctly reflect the general sentiment of the Army when I say that when the contest was ended, when the battles had all been fought and the fruits of the war secured, and when the graves of their fallen comrades were yet unturfed and every recollection of the conflict was fresh in their minds, that no soldier, had it been in his power, would then have added or wished to add one pang more to the sufferings that he so well knew had been endured by those who fought against him as well as by those who fought with him.

Such was the feeling between the men who composed the ranks of the great armies. Though fighting against each other, they were fighting over national issues and not as personal enemies. I have more than once seen a soldier, on a chilly night after a bloody struggle, deprive himself of his blanket to cover a wounded, dying enemy. These pictures will be the last, I hope, to fail from my recollections of the great war. In such deeds are founded the highest hopes of the future of our race. If after one of the great battles had been fought, some one, like Falstaff at Tewkesbury, who had shirked the dangers of the conflict, had come upon the field after the roar of the battle had died away to trouble and torture the dead and dying, how it would have stirred the wrath of an honorable soldier! How much more worthy a Christian people is it now fifteen years after the last shot was fired, and when almost a new generation of people have come upon the stage of life, to seek to open afresh old wounds and stir up old strifes for party gain. I stand as firmly as any man for the principles maintained by the war, and to secure the legitimate results of the war—the Union made perpetual, the extinction of slavery, and the equality of all citizens before the law. But I insist that the rights of the States and the rights of the people to local self-government were never intended to be assailed. The war was waged to save, not to destroy; to maintain and not to break down the safeguards of free government. This achieved, let the past be forgotten; in the future lie our hopes, when

The common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House general debate upon the pending bill is now closed. The Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs for amendment and discussion under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter stated, namely:

PUBLIC PRINTING.

For the public printing and binding and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for the Departments, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving, $400,000.

Mr. McMAHON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11 strike out "$400,000" and insert "$300,000."

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to make a very brief statement to the House. The amount in the bill was agreed upon when the bill was first considered, about the 5th day of March, 1890. It was the amount which by the majority of the committee was thought to be necessary from that time. In whatever way this bill may be expedited it cannot well be signed before the last of this week, and cannot be law much earlier than next Monday, the 22d. If gentlemen will make the calculation, they will see that but eighty-six working days will remain to the close of the fiscal year. A pay-roll of $3,000 a day, would amount in that period to about $200,000; and if you allow $50,000 or $60,000 for paper in the mean time, you will have given the Public Printer an ample sum. And I wish to say further that the only way in which you can control the expenditures of this department is by limiting the amount of money you give to the Public Printer.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have but a single word to say upon this question. I had intended to move to increase this amount to $450,000, but on reflection have concluded to stand by the amount in the bill as it now is.

I believe the statement made by my friend from Ohio is disingenuous. To start with, the pay-roll for the month of February has not been paid, and that for the month of March will not be paid until long after this bill has been signed, if it is signed at the period of time indicated by the gentleman from Ohio. Therefore it is necessary for us to make this appropriation for a period commencing certainly as early as the first day of March. I desire to make another suggestion with reference to this matter. My friends upon the committee, I think, or every one of them who has investigated this question, will agree with me that the monthly pay-rolls of this department amount to $100,000. There is no dispute about that. From $100,000 to $150,000 a month are necessary to pay the force that is being employed there to-day, and during the discussion of this question no gentleman has been able to point to any portion of that force that might with propriety be discharged. Again, there is no sort of doubt but that the current expenses of the department will average from $30,000 to $40,000, perhaps will go as high as $50,000 each month. Therefore, from now till the 30th day of June, there must of necessity be expended in this department the sum of at least $450,000.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest that the average pay-roll of the last fiscal year was little over $55,000 a month?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not discussing the question of what the pay-roll was for the past fiscal year. We have been discussing here at great length the increase in volume of labor which is being performed in that department to the present time. What we state is the amount which to-day is being expended on the pay-rolls there; and I ask any member of the sub-committee which has investigated that question to point to an employé in that service who can with propriety be discharged. The idea that this bill may be signed at a late period, that it may not be signed until one or two weeks hence, should have no bearing on that question, for the reason that the pay-roll is past due, and for the month of March is not expected to be paid until during the month of April.

The Appropriations Committee, by a majority vote, against a vote, I may say, of the gentleman who has charge of this bill, agreed upon the sum of $400,000 as the proper amount to be put in this bill. I then stated, and I state now, I do not believe that is sufficient; and I believe we will be compelled to come in here and ask for a further and additional appropriation before this session of Congress is through to make good this deficiency. Therefore it is that I urge that the sum of $400,000, the amount that is in the bill, should be retained there, and that the proposed amendment should not prevail.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to strike out the last word.

I only take advantage of the five minutes allowed me to answer a proposition which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] made yesterday, and which I cannot consent to let go unanswered. The gentleman read from a document, which we found lying on our desks, purporting to be the speech of Hon. T. W. Burdick. This speech was lying yesterday on every gentleman's desk in this Hall, printed I should estimate at a cost of $50 to $100, because the type was all taken down. If it was not, the Public Printer was guilty of misconduct in not taking it down at the end of a year's time. Now, to set up that type and print that speech at somebody's expense must have cost from $50 to $100; and this expense has been incurred by somebody in order that this House might be furnished with answers to the arguments made against the Public Printer. Inquired of the man whose business it is to supply Records from the Public Printer when a reprint is wanted, and he said all he knew about it was that he understood Mr. Painter had ordered a number of Mr. Burdick's speeches.

But whoever ordered them, whether they were printed by the Government Printer himself at the public cost and distributed here, or whether Mr. Painter, the gentleman who sold to the Government Printer the wire book-sewing machines, took the extraordinary precaution to do this, I care not. The gentleman from Connecticut read from these speeches a table, to prove that in the seven years when the public printing was done by contract—

Mr. HISCOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not wish to be interrupted during only five minutes. He read a table to show that in the seven years when the public printing was done by contract it cost more than it costs under the present system. Now, I want to say to the gentleman that he ought not to put his trust in wire book-sewing machine agents, for he may lean on a broken reed. This table is deceptive; it does not give the facts. Why? Take the seven years during which the printing was done under the contract system, and it will be found that during that time there were 453,770 more books printed than during seven years of the present system. Now, any printer will tell you that the cost of a book depends largely on the number printed. For instance, if but one copy of the Agricultural Report be printed, it might cost $1,000; while if a thousand copies be printed it would cost only about twenty-five cents a copy. Now, 453,770 more books were printed during the seven years under the contract system than have been printed in seven years of the present system.

Again, take the number of bills printed. The "usual" number of bills printed during the contract system was only five hundred and eighty. Under the law as it now stands "the usual number" is nine hundred and twenty-five. Consequently it costs a great deal less per copy under the present system, because there are less copies printed. Under the contract system the usual number of documents was fourteen hundred; now it is nineteen hundred.

But there was one item included in the estimate which if taken out makes the difference and more too in cost between the two systems. I refer to the matter of lithographing and engraving. For instance, in the seven years under the contract system the lithographing and engraving, which is included in this account, amounted to $1,000,000 more than under the seven years of the present system. But the lithographing and engraving has no business at all in the accounts on either side of the question. Why? Because under the present system the lithographing and engraving is done under a separate contract with lithographers and engravers, and the Public Printer has nothing whatever to do with it. Therefore, there is $1,000,000 included in this estimate for lithographing and engraving in order to prove to gentlemen here that the printing is now costing a great deal less than it did under the contract system. I call attention to the following table:

Table showing the difference between the cost of printing for seven years under the contract and present systems.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know who caused to be printed the copies of Mr. Burdick's speech which were distributed here. I estimate that if it was stereotyped it would cost probably a cent and a half or two cents a copy.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman says "if it was stereotyped." It was not stereotyped.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know whether it was stereotyped or not. I suggest that if the gentleman wants an investigating committee on this little bill of $10 he should have it, although I should be inclined to say about it as Daniel Webster said about the national debt, that I would pay it myself.

The two speeches of Mr. Burdick were an admirable illustration of the truth and the facts in the case. For myself I will say that I voted for the minority report of the Hatcher investigating committee, but I referred yesterday to the speeches of Mr. Burdick as being a very excellent and instructive presentation of the case.

Now, it is not a matter of the slightest consequence who caused those speeches to be printed, unless the gentleman thinks that the public service was corrupted by their being printed. I presume Mr. Defrees paid for it, as furnishing a better presentation of the case than others could make here; certainly a better presentation than I can make. But enough for that.

It seemed to me that the impression was conveyed by what was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] that the Committee on Appropriations had agreed upon the sum of $300,000 for this item. On the contrary, it is the recorded vote of the committee that $400,000 should be appropriated for this purpose.

It is not to be expected that in a three-minute or five-minute talk I can go again into all these items. Perhaps the discussion has continued long enough. I will say that the Committee on Appropriations, after a long inquiry into this subject, the Public Printer himself stating that he ought to have $490,000 to carry out his obligations and perform his duties—the Committee on Appropriations decided that he could get along with $400,000. My colleague on the committee [Mr. HISCOCK] has shown in what way this amount is needed. I hope the House will not reduce the amount for this item one dollar, for if they do it will only lead to another deficiency bill. The work to be done requires every dollar of this money and more too. And there is no sort of economy, when you have to pay a ten-dollar note, and you can make nothing by it, to pay only $8 upon it.

Mr. HUNTON. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] whether, if his amendment prevails, reducing the amount of this appropriation from $400,000 to $300,000, there will be enough appropriated to pay for publishing, among other things, the Agricultural Report.

Mr. FINLEY. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. COBB. I renew the amendment and yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON.]

Mr. McMAHON. I wish to answer a question which has been put to me from several sides of the House, whether if we appropriate $300,000 it will be sufficient to publish the Agricultural Reports. I want to say to gentlemen of the committee that the estimated cost of printing the Agricultural Report is $164,000, which is about $25,000 or $30,000 more than a similar number of copies of the same kind of book have cost within the last four or five years. Of that $164,000 all has been paid according to the table furnished us by the Public Printer except $16,000; only $16,000 is necessary to finish the Agricultural Report.

One of my reasons for thinking that the amount asked by the Public Printer is too large is that his estimate to us, $450,000, is the amount which he considered necessary to furnish the paper, composition, and printing for all the books that have been ordered by Congress up to the present day; and when I asked the question whether he could print half those within the present fiscal year he said, "No." Of course everybody knows that the bulk of this expenditure must go into the next fiscal year.

Mr. AIKEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question at this point. It is very well known that during the last fifteen or thirty days the supply of Agricultural Reports at the folding-room has been greatly inadequate, has not equaled the demand by any means; yet it is also very well known that members desiring to get these books to send home to their constituents can go out into the highways of this city and buy them by the dozen. The gentleman says, moreover, that the appropriation for printing 300,000 copies of these documents was $164,000, which would be about fifty-five cents apiece; yet in the streets of Washington I have been offered as many of these books as I wanted by the dozen at ten cents apiece; and the books thus offered are bound up and pasted in wrappers in precisely the same style as when they come from the folding-room. I desire to know whether the gentleman who has charge of this bill can enlighten us as to these irregularities?

Mr. HAWLEY rose.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the propriety of printing three hundred thousand copies of the Agricultural Report. They have been ordered; and if the House does not desire that many to be printed let us revoke the order; but if it is to stand, let us give the money to have them printed.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] says he can buy these documents below cost of second-hand dealers. Very well; let us have a committee of investigation and see who sell these public documents to dealers. I know for myself that I buy some from a second-hand dealer. There are some city members, I suppose, who have not a farmer among their constituents, and that may account for the way some of these reports get into the market. I concede that it ought not to be so. But I know that the agricultural members are constantly begging these documents of city members and are buying them of second-hand dealers. I repeat, if we do not want so many of these documents printed let us revoke the order; but while the order stands let us appropriate money to carry it out.

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman does not seem to comprehend that only $16,000 will be needed to complete the whole 300,000 copies.

Mr. HAWLEY. But the Public Printer estimates that $490,000 will be required to complete the work already ordered.

Since I rose this morning I have received information concerning the mysterious developments in connection with the speeches of Mr. Burdick, of Iowa. Those speeches were printed from the stereotyped plates of the RECORD, according to the law by which anybody can go and obtain copies of public documents. I have here the receipted bill; and the amount is $10.40, instead of the $50 or $100 of which the gentleman from Ohio spoke. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish to make a single suggestion in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that if we do not wish these reports printed, we should not appropriate for them. Some members have received their full quota of the 300,000 while others have received a very small number of copies; so that it would be very unjust if we should now refuse to appropriate enough money to print the whole number already ordered.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from Connecticut tell us what receipt that is to which he referred?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is signed "W. A. Smith, for the Public Printer."

Mr. FINLEY. To whom?

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, that is his business; under the law he had the right to have this done. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, it appears (and I have not yet heard it disputed) that $193,588.39 is necessary to be expended upon departmental printing. We all know the necessity for that work, and that it should be done. It has not been questioned that this work is required by the Departments. Now, the cost of the RECORD has been estimated by the Public Printer at $90,000. I do not know that it will cost so much; but I have seen no table and have heard no argument tending to show that the actual cost will be much below these figures. It is estimated that there will be required for printing bills, reports of committees, and current printing of Congress $59,272.78, making, in the aggregate, $342,861.17, which, so far as I have heard, no gentleman on this floor has attacked or shown to be unnecessary. This is an expenditure that is required; and I have not taken into consideration the printing of any report.

I have not taken into consideration the printing of any public document, but this item as you have it in this bill allows for the sum of $50,000.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some confusion in regard to the manner in which the Public Printer settles his accounts at the Treasury Department. My friend from New York talks about the departmental printing kept at the Treasury Department. The Government Printer settles his account on pay rolls and vouchers for materials, &c., and requisitions for paper. It makes no difference how much he charges the Departments for work. That is not reported to the Treasury Department, nor settled as a Department debt. He simply reports his pay-rolls and his expenditures for materials, including paper, ink, &c. Therefore, when you ascertain how much pay-roll he ought to have, how much paper he will need in addition to what he has on hand already paid for, then you will exactly know how much ought to be appropriated.

I wish to say in justice to the Committee on Appropriations, and I intended to say it in moving the reduction of this amount from $400,000 to $300,000, that I did not do so by authority of that committee. Probably I should not have done so, having charge of the bill, but as I have made investigation in regard to the amount of paper on hand, and into certain items furnished to me which were not given to me when I made my speech, but which are incorporated in the appendix to it as published in the RECORD, I became satisfied that $400,000 was too much, and felt I would be wanting in my duty to the House if I did not make an effort to reduce it to $300,000 and let the House take the responsibility of voting between $300,000 and $400,000 as it saw fit.

Mr. HISCOCK, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I feel it to be my duty as a member of the Committee on Appropriations to insist upon the adoption of the paragraph of the bill as reported from that committee. It so happens that the gentleman from Ohio has dissented from a majority of the committee, and it is his right, entertaining the views he does, to move to reduce the amount to $300,000. This matter has been carefully considered by the Committee on Appropriations, detail after detail, and the majority of that committee agreed to report the amount which it is now proposed to reduce.

It is impossible, Mr. Chairman, and I shall not attempt it, to go into a discussion of all the details of the public printing in order to answer the various points raised by gentlemen on this floor. There is, in my opinion, a looseness in the system there. We are, as we all know, without any system in reference to the public printing. Sometimes the Committee on Printing report in favor of printing books, and sometimes it is done over the heads of the Committee on Printing. There is no system about it in the House. Then, again, when it gets down to the Printing Office, the orders of the House are not always executed. Heretofore they never have been. It runs through a period of several years. The appropriation for one year has been made to run through a period of several years. I presume there has been a larger amount of printing than usual, not ordered by this Congress, but ordered by previous Congresses, and the Public Printer, until we shall adopt some system to restrain him, is at liberty under the law to go on and print as he pleases. Until that is done it does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, we are entirely without remedy, however much of extravagance there may be in the Printing Office.

Now, sir, as to the matter of economy. Whether the democratic party of this House have in their past history reduced the expenses of the Government is without question. When the matter is investigated the response will come that millions of money have been saved to the Government of the United States by the action of the democratic party. It does not become us, however, to higgie because from lack of system or any other cause, there may have been an unusual amount of appropriation required for Government printing. That does not go to the record we have made. I think it the duty of this House, unless there are reasons other than those which now appear, to adopt the report of the majority of the Committee on Appropriations. Gentlemen are anxious in regard to their Agricultural Reports. There are other documents they are anxious about. It does seem to me, sir, we might very well vote this appropriation, and do it with the distinct understanding that the Public Printer is not to return here to ask any additional deficiency. The issue has been made. We propose to give him money to finish up the work of this fiscal year, and it is in his discretion to withhold enough printing of documents to keep him within that appropriation. He has done it heretofore. There is printing for the Forty-third Congress; printing for the Forty-fourth Congress; and printing for the Forty-fifth Congress there to-day yet to be done. He has not found it necessary heretofore to go on and complete every order at once. It is his duty, therefore, to take notice that this appropriation means the finishing up of this fiscal year; that after he shall use the funds in his possession he shall not come to this House for another deficiency for this fiscal year. I regret very much after Congress sought to restrain the Public Printer by stating specifically the amount which was intended for each department and each bureau, the amount for the departments and the amount for Congress, he should have seen fit to treat the whole matter in his relations with the printing department without the slightest reference to those restrictions.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Appropriations Committee who voted to fix the amount for the deficiency in the Government Printing Office at $400,000, I wish to give in a few sentences my reason for it. At the beginning of the year, as has been stated, we gave $1,500,000 to the Printing Office. Of that amount there was given to the Departments specifically for their use $743,000, not quite one-half of the amount. They have used of that amount—I mean of the amount appropriated for the Departments—in their printing $475,000, leaving due to the Departments $268,000. But the Public Printer, in order to do the current work and to carry on the publication of the books ordered, has used almost the entire balance appropriated to the Departments, together with that appropriated for carrying on the RECORD and the miscellaneous printing. It is true in this I do not think he has followed the law, but it is the practice, and has been the practice of that office for years past, to use this fund indiscriminately.

He should have notified, and I believe he did notify, us at the beginning of this session that the funds would be short; and he should have refrained from the printing of books or anything else until the new appropriation was made. But supposing that the practice heretofore made would be sanctioned by this House, not only was that appropriation for the miscellaneous printing and for books, &c., used, but it trenched upon the amount set apart for the several Departments, and from that fund $193,000 has been used. And at the beginning of this month he has but $75,000 on hand of that, although there was due to these several Departments this $193,000. Now, we must pay that. The Departments cannot stop for the want of printing, and, although the Public Printer may have erred in this matter and may have done wrong, we are compelled, unless we stop the printing of the Departments, to replace this $193,000. That is an item which has been charged against us, and we must provide for it or the Departments will not have the printing done.

Then, again, it will take, according to his estimates, $90,000 for the printing of the RECORD for the remainder of this session of Congress. Do you propose to give that amount or do you propose by withholding it to stop the printing of the RECORD? One or the other is inevitable. You must give the money or the RECORD will not be printed. So, I say, we will have to provide for that $90,000.

Then the amount necessary for miscellaneous printing is estimated at $60,000. We must provide for this. If we order reports and bills and matters of that sort to be printed we must provide the fund to pay for it. The money must be there.

The Printer settles his account with the Treasury Department on his pay-rolls and accounts of material used, and when I was interrogated recently as to whether these pay-rolls could be duplicated and the Government thereby defrauded, I answered that I did not think that it could be done. There are two ways, and two ways only, in my judgment, in which this can be done. One is by collusion in the purchase of material which the Public Printer is authorized to buy, and by paying more for it than is absolutely necessary. There is no proof, to my mind, that he has done either to any great extent.

These amounts to which I have referred foot up in the aggregate $340,000 of the deficiency. How are you going to get round it? That amount is required as I have shown for these several branches of the service and we must provide for it. The gentleman may laugh. He [Mr. COBB] has perhaps examined this matter and differs with me in the judgment which I have formed, but I propose to give my views without reference to what the opinions of other gentlemen may be. I give my own views, based upon the examination which I have myself made.

I have stated that these amounts foot up the sum of $343,000. Now you have the books which have been ordered, and we propose to give $57,000 for the balance of the fiscal year for that purpose. The Public Printer wants $100,000, yet we believe that $57,000 will enable him to run through the next three months. This amount added to the $343,000 makes the $400,000 which it is proposed to appropriate in this bill, and it was upon that basis that the Committee on Appropriations agreed to provide this amount for the Printing Office, during the remainder of the current year. I do not apologize for any wrong done in that office, but I simply treat matters as I find them.

Mr. BAYNE. I am, no doubt, somewhat of an intruder in this debate, trenching upon the high prerogatives of the Committee on Appropriations, and for an outsider to step in and make a speech on the subject under consideration requires a degree of presumption for which, perhaps, I should make an apology. I nevertheless feel that, in consequence of the fact that I was a member of the Committee on Public Expenditures in the last Congress which investigated the Public Printer, it is my duty to say a word on this occasion lest my silence should be construed into acquiescence in the conclusion of the majority of that committee on that occasion. I feel that it is but just to vindicate the Public Printer against the charges which have been made on this floor against his management of that establishment and the innuendoes and insinuations against his good faith and integrity which are contained in the report of the majority of that committee, and which have been alluded to frequently by gentlemen on the other side, and made the text of the speech of the then chairman of the sub-committee, Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio.

I have not time to go into details, but I will call attention to just one or two things by way of example. The report charges that the manner of book-keeping in that establishment was totally unreliable, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] in his speech said that many of the accounts were kept on loose slips of paper which were permitted to lie on the desk, thus intimating to the House that these slips of paper might at any time become lost and the traces of the transactions of that department might not be obtainable. The evidence regarding that point is that these entries were made on slips of paper, and those slips of paper for the purpose of safe keeping were locked up in the safe, and that the clerk in that respect had departed from the rules that had hitherto prevailed in the department.

To sustain what I say I call attention to the following extracts from the testimony of Mr. Larcombe, (pages 263, 264:)

Question. Then you did not make the entries which appear on the debit side of the cash-book either at the time at which the sale was made or at which the money was paid?

Answer. No, sir.

Q. You made these entries at the time at which you made the deposit in the Treasury?

A. In every instance.

Q. Where did you keep the figures constituting the accounts from which you made these entries here?

A. I kept them on a paper which I keep in my safe. When a deposit was made, I made those entries which appear in this book.

Q. Then, if I understand you, you kept a record of all sums of money received from sales of waste paper, and all other accounts, not in this book but on a quire of paper?

A. I did, down to two years ago.

Q. And when you made a deposit of money in the Treasury you would at that time copy into this book from that quire of paper the amounts you had received?

A. I would enter in this book the items which appear there. I would add up the amounts and take the money to the Treasury and make a deposit.

Q. Would you enter here, at the time of making the deposit, all the items which appear here from the loose sheets of paper of which you speak?

A. Well, you may call them "loose sheets" if you like.

Q. Why did you not make the entries in a book?

A. Now I will tell you exactly why. I never had, mark you, one moment's instruction in book-keeping; never knew anything about book-keeping; I was brought up in a printing office. Now, I wanted, if any man paying any of these moneys desired to raise an inquiry about moneys paid in here by him, that I should be able to show a permanent record containing the amount of those moneys, a statement of what he paid them for, why he paid them, and the whole transaction up to the deposit of the moneys in the Treasury of the United States. That was an original idea with me.

Q. Why did you not make the entries at once in the book?

A. Because I wanted to do it in that way.

Q. Suppose that the loose sheets of paper had been lost?

A. They could not have been lost any more readily than would that book have been lost, because they were locked up in an iron safe.

Now hear what the report says on page 24:

In the mean time, until transferred to his cash-book, he frequently kept the account of this money on loose slips of paper or in his memory.

The evidence and the report placed side by side evolve all the commentary on the report that is needful to show its unreliability.

Another proposition was that money was retained in the hands of the Public Printer and not covered into the Treasury, intimating that the Public Printer or some of his subordinates were deriving advantages from having funds belonging to the Government in their possession. That is an unjust insinuation against the integrity of those officers. It is shown by the evidence that every dollar of the money coming into their hands was covered into the Treasury or was legitimately used for the purposes of that Department. There is not a scintilla of evidence in all the seven hundred pages of testimony that has been taken which indicates that the Public Printer or any subordinate in his office used any money belonging to the Government for any other than legitimate purposes. The evidence is that they paid it into the Treasury just as soon as they ought to pay it.

It is true there is much speculation as to what might have been done, but it is untrue to charge that anything wrong was done. The gravest insinuation, however, will be found on page 23 of the report. Here it is:

FRAUDS IN THE MATTER OF POST-OFFICE BLANKS.

In the course of our investigation we were led to inquire into certain fraudulent transactions occurring under the former administration of the present Public Printer, John D. Defrees, by which it appears that the Government was defrauded out of large sums of money, estimated by one of the witnesses at $250,000.

There is no subsequent qualification of this passage in the report which will take away its sting. Yet it is most unjust and unfair. What little connection Mr. Defrees had with it in no way involved his integrity. His name would not have been connected with it had it not been for one Carlisle, who never made drafts on his imagination in vain where he had an object to accomplish.

This man had been a Treasury agent in 1868, and had been deputed by the Postmaster-General to investigate alleged frauds in the purchase of paper and printing of blanks for the use of the Post-Office Department. He discovered frauds, and ascertained that the contractors had defrauded the Government out of considerable money. The matter was thoroughly sifted, and it was clearly shown that Mr. Defrees was in no way complicated in the frauds. This man, Carlisle, was put on the stand in the investigation by the sub-committee of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] was chairman. He was a ready witness, a willing witness. Under the skillful examination of the chairman of the sub-committee he said, on May 6, 1878:

Question. Could this fraud have been perpetrated without detection unless by collusion between the Government Printer or his chief clerk and these other parties?

Answer. It would have been impossible.

The next day, referring to the same subject, he said in reply to the question:

Question. I am aware of the answer which you gave yesterday, but the question as now stated is in a form different from that in which it was stated yesterday.

Answer. Those frauds could not have been successfully carried on had Mr. Defrees supervised the inspection and adjustment of the accounts as was required by the law.

This man had doubtless promised wonderful revelations. He was the sort of a man who always has a stock of revelations on hand. He made another discovery, so he swore: a deficit in the Public Printer's accounts of $119,746.65. He so testified, January 23, 1879. Hear what he said:

By Mr. BURDICK:

Question. When were you last before the sub-committee investigating the Government Printing Office?

Answer. I think it was in June.

Q. Did you testify then?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you present some exhibits then?

A. I did.

Q. Did they show a deficit in the accounts of the Government Printing Office?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What amount of deficit did they show?

A. I forget the amount.

Mr. FINLEY. Look at it and answer.

The WITNESS. One hundred and nineteen thousand seven hundred and forty-six dollars and sixty-five cents.

Now listen to what he said the next day, January 24:

By Mr. BURDICK:

Question. Since the adjournment of the committee on yesterday have you re-examined any of the exhibits which you then submitted?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. Which one have you re-examined?

A. The one for the year ending September 30, 1875.

Q. Did you find any error or errors in it?

A. I found an error in it of $100,000.

He had got down a good deal. See where he lands, however, under the ordeal of a cross-examination in the matter of a deficiency:

Question. As an expert, would you say that these amounts reported as a deficiency by these statements are a real deficiency in the accounts of the Public Printer?

Answer. I cannot say that they are.

There was no deficiency after all.

I have stated only a few instances, embracing the most serious and most definite charges, if there is anything definite in the whole business, for the purpose of showing their utter want of foundation.

The object of the inquiry was to do away with the present system of public printing and replace it with the contract system. The only frauds discovered during the long investigation of that committee, were perpetrated under the contract system. The history of the contract system bristles with frauds. While it is no doubt true that the present system is liable at times to abuses, it is certainly the best, and it is only necessary to keep an honest and capable man in charge of it to have it entirely successful. I am confident that the gentleman now in charge is both capable and honest.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of making a brief personal explanation.

Gentlemen around me say that in giving the cost of the speech of Mr. Burdick I said that it must have cost from $500 to $1,000. Gentlemen must see it is very evident that I could not have intended to make that statement. What I intended to say was that five hundred or one thousand copies of these speeches would cost from $50 to $100. I had it in my mind that there had been printed and distributed from five hundred to one thousand copies in this House; and any one must have known that I could not have intended to state the cost of that number of copies at $500 or $1,000. The gentleman from Connecticut

[Mr. HAWLEY] produced a receipt signed by Mr. Smith for the Public Printer. That same Mr. Smith told me yesterday, when these documents were printed and lying on our desks and I asked him who had ordered them, that the order had not been addressed to him and that they had not been paid for through him.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. McMAHON's amendment to strike out "$400,000" and insert "$300,000," it was not agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I now, under instructions from the Committee on Printing, offer the amendment of which I have heretofore given notice.

Mr. McMAHON. The question of order is reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of order can be made after the amendment is read.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment as follows:

Add as a proviso to the pending paragraph the following:

Provided, That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," as is in the words following: "That so much of all laws or parts of laws as provide for the election or appointment of Public Printer be, and the same are hereby, repealed, to take effect from and after the passage of this act; and the President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a suitable person, who must be a practical printer and versed in the art of book-binding, to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office from and after the date aforesaid; he shall be called the Public Printer, and shall be vested with all the powers and subject to all the restrictions pertaining to the officer now known as the Public Printer; he shall give bond in the sum of $100,000 for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, said bond to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior," be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided further, That the House of Representatives shall elect some competent person, who shall be a practical printer, to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office. The person so elected shall be deemed an officer of the House of Representatives, and shall be denominated Congressional Printer, and shall hold his office for two years and until his successor shall be elected; he shall give bond in the sum of $100,000 for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, said bond to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; he shall superintend the printing and binding of the Journals and such other documents as shall be ordered by each House of Congress, and shall superintend the execution of all the printing and binding for the respective Departments of the Government now required by law to be executed at the Government Printing Office, and shall, in all respects, be governed by the laws in force in relation to the Public Printer and the execution of the printing and binding; and the salary of said officer shall be $3,400 per annum: Provided further, That as soon as practicable after the election of said Congressional Printer, he shall cause to be prepared a complete invoice of all the material, type, presses, leather, paper, utensils, fixtures, furniture, stock, horses, wagons, carriages, harnesses, and personal property of every description whatever under his charge and belonging to the Government; said invoice shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the Congressional Printer, reported to Congress, and printed. And thereafter, at the beginning of each fiscal year, or as soon thereafter as practicable, he shall cause a new inventory of all of the said personal property then in his possession to be taken. Said inventory shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the Congressional Printer, and published as a part of his annual report to Congress. This proviso to take effect from and after the date of its passage.

Mr. McMAHON. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to raise the question of order on this amendment.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman if he stated the Committee on Appropriations instructed him to make the point of order. I certainly understood the vote of the committee on that subject to be the indication of their desire that the amendment should not be placed upon this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the matter as it has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio, that that gentleman was instructed to raise the point of order by a direct vote of the committee.

Mr. McMAHON. I ask the point of order for this reason: This is a bill providing for the immediate necessities of the Government. And I may say it is a bill providing for the immediate necessities of a large number of people who are dependent on its speedy passage. Therefore, without expressing any opinion on the merits of the bill the committee have instructed me at all events to resist its being attached to this appropriation bill.

I make the point of order that it does not come within Rule XXI; that it is not germane, and does not necessarily retrench expenditures.

Mr. GARFIELD. A single word in support of the point of order made by my colleague, [Mr. McMAHON.] This bill which we are now discussing is not even a general appropriation bill; it is a special deficiency bill. It does not come under the head of general appropriation bills; it is a bill for miscellaneous deficiencies. We have now reached the clause of the bill providing for deficiencies in the Government Printing Office. A proposition which creates an office and provides for the election of an officer is not germane to a mere appropriation to supply deficiencies; and on that score I think the point is well taken.

Mr. CLYMER. It is a good point.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask attention to the fourth clause of Rule XXI of the new rules. Heretofore the rule was that it was not in order to offer any pending bill before the House as an amendment to another bill; that is, if an amendment identically the same with a bill pending before the House was offered to another bill, it was out of order. That rule was evaded by changing the text in some unimportant particulars by striking out a few words, so as to make it not identically the same bill, and therefore in order. To prevent that the Committee on Rules changed the rule so that it now reads:

No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

If gentlemen will turn to the report of the committee, submitted at the time they reported the proposed revision of the rules, they will find the reasons given for this change of the rules:

The last portion of Rule 48, to wit, "No bill or resolution shall, at any time, be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith any other bill or resolution pending before the House," was adopted September 15, 1857, (first session Twenty-fifth Congress.) As then reported by the Committee on Rules, it contained after the word resolution, where it occurs the second time, the words "the substance of." These words were stricken out by a close vote, and the practice of the House has since permitted the substance of any bill or resolution pending before the House to be offered as an amendment or substitute for the pending proposition.

The committee believe the correct principle to be the proposition reported by the Committee on Rules in the Twenty-fifth Congress, excluding an amendment which contained the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House. The rules and practice of the House of Commons, from which this proposition was substantially taken, restricted the right of substituting one subject for another to motions for reading (that is, of proceeding to the consideration of) the orders of the day, thus giving the House an opportunity to select the particular subject it would first consider, and preventing the practical inconvenience that would result from public business being obstructed by substantive motions which had no connection with the orders of the day. Under the present rule "a bill or resolution pending before the House" may be moved as an amendment to a pending proposition, if germane, by simply changing a word or two in no sense important or material, thereby accomplishing indirectly what the rules prohibit doing directly, a species of parliamentary legerdemain that certainly ought not to be countenanced or permitted by a rule.

We have put in express language, in the rule, that the substance of a pending bill shall not be in order as an amendment. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] now offers as an amendment almost the identical bill which he reported some time ago from the Committee on Printing, and which is pending before the House; certainly the amendment embraces the substance of that bill. I think on both of these grounds the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. So far as my amendment is concerned, I do not regard it as being in substance the same as the bill to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] refers. The principal object of my amendment is to change the superintendent of the Printing Office from "Public Printer" to "Congressional Printer." The bill which was reported from the Committee on Printing, and which is now upon the Calendar, proposes to give the election of this Congressional Printer to the Senate. The amendment which I have offered proposes to vest that power in the House. If that is not a material change, if the amendment is still substantially the same as the bill, then I must confess that I do not understand the import of terms and language.

Another thing; the bill which was reported from the Committee on Printing and which is upon the Calendar, and which the gentleman says is the same in substance as my amendment, proposes to pay the Public Printer an annual salary of $3,500. The amendment that I have offered proposes to change that so as to reduce the amount of his salary. I admit that the change was made with the view of avoiding the very point of order which the gentleman now makes. I propose to treat this matter fairly and honestly. The change was made with that view. The election of the Congressional Printer is transferred by my amendment from the Senate to the House, and the salary is reduced $100.

I confess that the other features of the amendment are the same as the bill; but the main features of the bill have been changed in the amendment. It occurs to me, therefore, that my amendment is not subject to the point of order made by the gentleman. It certainly is germane to the clause to which it is proposed as an amendment; I think that cannot be questioned. It is in the line of economy, because it reduces the expenditures of the Government—it reduces the salary of an officer. In other respects it is substantially the same as the bill that was reported from the Committee on Printing and is now upon the Calendar.

As to the point that this is merely a special appropriation bill, and that there is a necessity for its immediate passage, I think there is nothing in that which renders my amendment liable to the criticism of the gentleman. For these reasons I think the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. McMAHON. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Is there in his amendment any other necessary reduction of expenditures except that of the salary of this officer?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. It makes no other reduction. It leaves the law to stand as it now is; under this amendment all the duties now devolving upon the Public Printer under the law will devolve upon the new officer proposed by my amendment.

Mr. McMAHON. Then I would call attention to this fact: the salary of the Public Printer is not provided for in this bill. Therefore the thing upon which the gentleman proposes to hang his economy is a thing not in this bill. The salary of the Public Printer is provided for in another bill.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I know that the law provides for the payment to him of a salary of $3,500.

Mr. McMAHON. That is in another appropriation bill.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. It is the law of the land; it is not in an appropriation bill; it is the standing law of the land and we propose now to change it.

Mr. BUCKNER. I submit to the Chair that the third section of Rule XXI applies not to deficiency bills, but to what are known as the general appropriation bills of this House—twelve in number. Now, it would be exceedingly unfortunate, when we are appropriating money to supply a deficiency, if an amendment of this sort could be introduced, getting up a discussion of a question like this, when it is important for the interests of the Government that the bill should pass as speedily as possible.

But there is another point to which attention has not been called. The rule requires that an amendment embracing legislation must, to be in order, "retrench expenditures." I hold that this means, according to the view taken by this House weeks ago, that the object shall be to "retrench expenditures," not that the amendment shall operate as a fraud upon the rule. The real purpose of the amendment should be not to reorganize any department of the Government, but to cut down expenditures. That should be clear to the House as the intention of the proposition, not merely subsidiary to it. The language of the rule is:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The object, the purpose should be to "retrench expenditures." That is the meaning of the rule; and I hope it will be the construction given to it. The retrenchment of expenditures should be the primary, substantial purpose of the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a single point. It is very important that rulings upon a new rule should be distinct and clear, so that we may understand their full force. The gentleman from Ohio on the other side [Mr. McMAHON] made the point of order that this amendment was not germane, and did not on its face retrench expenditures. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] made another point entirely distinct—that the amendment was not in order under clause 4 of Rule XXI. Now, if both points are regarded as pending at the same time, I simply desire that the Chair in ruling shall state distinctly upon which point he bases his ruling, so that there may be no confusion. It seems to me that the point of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] is perfectly well taken—that the amendment is not germane. To this point the gentleman from Mississippi replies that the amendment retrenches expenditures on its face $100.

The CHAIRMAN. Conceding that it does retrench expenditures, still the question whether or not it is germane remains.

Mr. FRYE. I was just coming to that. The reply of the gentleman from Mississippi answers only one-half of the proposition made by the gentleman from Ohio. It is entirely clear to me that the amendment is not germane. Now if that is clear to the chairman, I ask either that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will withdraw his second point, and not ask a ruling upon it, or else that the chairman, in his ruling, will state distinctly upon which point he bases his decision.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course the Chair is not obliged to rule on all the points raised. If he rules the amendment out upon one point, that will be sufficient. But I do not want to run the risk of not having points enough presented.

Mr. FRYE. But I do not want the Chair to rule the amendment out of order, and not say upon which point he does so. Nor do I wish him to rule it out because it is not germane, and take no account whatever of the other point of order, thus giving room perhaps for the inference that the other point was not well taken. I believe both are well taken.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt the Chair will give his reasons, whatever his ruling may be, one way or the other.

Mr. HOOKER. The amendment of my colleague from Mississippi has encountered two objections from the opposite side of the House. As I understand, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has made the point that it is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] makes the further objection that, under the fourth clause of Rule XXI, no bill or resolution can at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; I was requesting the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to withdraw that point and raise it if it should become necessary at a later stage. I do not make it.

Mr. HOOKER. Then the only objection to the proposition of my colleague is that presented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that the amendment is not germane to the subject-matter, and falls under the provisions of the third clause of Rule XXI. If there is any proposition on the part of the gentleman from Ohio under the fourth clause of the rule, I would like to know it, so that I may reply to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw that for the time being, reserving my right to renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that when a point of order is made, it necessarily brings up for the consideration of the Chair all the reasons for and against the point of order.

Mr. McMAHON. I will say to my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] that I do not appreciate the strength of his point of order, because this is not one of the regular appropriation bills, but is intended as a supplemental bill to fill out all the anticipated deficiencies for the present fiscal year.

Mr. HOOKER. I cannot yield to the gentleman further. Am I right in supposing that the only objection now presented to the consideration of the amendment of my colleague is that it is obnoxious to the provisions of the third clause of Rule XXI because not germane to the subject-matter of the bill, and because it does not reduce expenditures?

As I understand the rule, Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to all the objections suggested by the gentleman from Ohio who, in his omnium gatherum style of disposing of questions, wanted to take every rule which he thought might be infringed by the amendment offered by my colleague from Mississippi, but who has now the modesty at least to withdraw one of the propositions, on the suggestion of his friend from Maine that it was not a proper one to make.

In reference to the one that is made I desire simply to say that certainly to a deficiency bill, not a general appropriation bill making appropriations, but to a deficiency bill which proposes to remedy certain appropriations which have been demonstrated to be insufficient for the purpose, made for the current year, where there is an appropriation for public printing of the House, such an amendment is germane. My colleague from Mississippi comes in with a proposition to dispense with the mode and method of printing now in use and adopt another which is more economical in style. That answers the question as to whether or not the amendment offered by my colleague from Mississippi is germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

It is not a general appropriation bill, but it is a deficiency bill proposing to remedy the insufficiency of the annual appropriation by amendment as to the mode and method in which this appropriation shall be disbursed, and is therefore under the rule, as it now stands, XXI of the new series of rules adopted by the House, subject for the consideration of the House as to what is the best method of applying the money which the Appropriations Committee proposes to appropriate. For doing what, Mr. Chairman? For carrying on the public printing of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will allow the Chair to make a suggestion on that point.

Mr. HOOKER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the very question, whether the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi makes any disposition whatever of any part of the money which this bill proposes to appropriate.

Mr. HOOKER. Very well, sir; on that suggestion I will say the amendment as introduced by my colleague proposes to change the method of doing the public printing, thus carrying along with it a proposition cognate to the item submitted by the Committee on Appropriations in this deficiency bill. When you use the term as to whether or not it is germane to the bill you mean, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it under ordinary parliamentary language, as to whether or not it is of that nature and order to make it cognate to the subject-matter of the bill itself. And in that sense and in that way I say this proposition to change the method of doing the public printing is germane to the subject-matter. In other words, it proposes it shall be done in a different way; and certainly that different way has been demonstrated, by more than one speech on this subject, to look toward the reduction of the public expenditures. Therefore the objection taken by the gentleman from Ohio, either as to the fact whether the amendment offered by my colleague from Mississippi is germane to the subject-matter or whether it looks to the other correlative proposition in this rule, that it shall look to the reduction of public expenditures, I say that it does both; I say it is germane to the subject-matter; that, in other words, the proposition of my colleague from Mississippi proposes to change the method of doing this public service different from that which this Appropriations Committee in this bill proposes, and at a cheaper rate. Therefore the objection raised by the gentleman from Ohio is neither good as to the one point nor the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] under instructions from the Committee on Printing, is objected to upon two grounds: first, that it is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill under consideration; and, secondly, that it is in substance the same as a bill heretofore reported by the Committee on Printing and now pending before the House.

Notice of this amendment was given several days since, and during the general debate in the Committee of the Whole the Chair was advised that a point of order would be raised against it; so that a reasonable opportunity has been afforded to examine the subject, and the Chair will now state the conclusions at which he has arrived.

In the absence of an express rule, the amendment would not be liable to a point of order upon the ground that it was inconsistent with, or not germane to, the subject under consideration, for, according to the common parliamentary law of this country and of England, a legislative assembly might by an amendment, in the ordinary form or in the form of a substitute, change the entire character of any bill or other proposition pending. It might entirely displace the original subject under consideration, and in its stead adopt one wholly foreign to it, both in form and in substance.

But ever since the 4th of March, 1789, this House has had a rule which changed the common parliamentary law in this respect, at least as to substitutes, and ever since 1822 as to amendments in any form. The Congress of the Confederation, in 1781, adopted a rule in the following words:

No new motion or proposition shall be admitted under color of amendment as a substitute for a question or proposition under debate until it is postponed or disagreed to.

The House of Representatives of the First Congress, on the 4th of March, 1789, adopted the following rule upon this subject:

No new motion or proposition shall be admitted under color of amendment as a substitute for the motion or proposition under debate.

It will be observed that each of these rules admitted amendments introducing new motions or propositions, if they were not offered as substitutes for the motion or proposition under debate. But in March, 1822, the House changed the rule of 1789, so as to make it read as follows:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

And in this form the rule has stood ever since, and now constitutes a part of the seventh clause of Rule XVI in the recent revision. The rule does not prohibit a committee reporting a bill from embracing in it as many different subjects as it may choose; but after the bill has been reported to the House no different subject can be introduced into it by amendment, whether as a substitute or otherwise.

When, therefore, it is objected that a proposed amendment is not in order because it is not germane, the meaning of the object is simply that it (the proposed amendment) is a motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration. This is the test of admissibility prescribed by the express language of the rule; and if the Chair, upon an examination of the bill under consideration and the proposed amendment, shall be of the opinion that they do not relate to the same subject, he is bound to sustain the objection and exclude the amendment, subject, of course, to the revisory power of the Committee of the Whole on appeal.

It is not always easy to determine whether or not a proposed amendment relates to a subject different from that under consideration, within the meaning of the rule; and it is especially difficult to do so when, as in the present instance, the amendment may, by reason of the terms it employs, appear to have a remote relation to the original subject.

The subject to which the bill now under consideration relates is very clearly set forth in its title. It is "a bill making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes." The appropriations "for other purposes" contained in the bill do not relate at all to any of the subjects embraced in the amendment, and therefore need not be noticed. The words "for other purposes" are used here, as they usually are, to embrace subjects outside of the main subjects to which the bill relates, and which are reported by the committee itself.

The bill relates to no other subjects than appropriations of money for the purpose stated, "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government." One of the deficiencies which the bill provides for is in the Government Printing Office. But the bill carefully enumerates the items for which the appropriation is to be made, and the salary of the Public Printer is not among them.

The proposed amendment has no relation to the appropriation of money for any purpose. It neither increases nor diminishes the amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill; nor does it in any manner affect the expenditure of the money proposed to be appropriated by the bill. The salary of the Public Printer, for the current fiscal year, has already been provided for in full; and it does not appear that there is any deficiency on that account.

The amendment relates solely to the method of choosing a Public Printer; to the nature of the duties to be performed by him, and to the amount of his salary. As already stated, the original bill embraces none of these matters; and consequently none of these subjects are now under consideration. It seems quite clear, therefore, that the proposed amendment, if admitted, would introduce for consideration one or more new subjects, and is, for that reason, prohibited by the express language of the rule.

Under the rule, as it stood prior to 1822, the amendment, although on a subject different from that under consideration, would be in order, for it is not offered as a substitute for the bill or for the clause under consideration. But as already noticed the prohibition applies now as well to ordinary amendments as to substitutes.

Since the adoption of the rule in its present form there have been several decisions under it; and so far as the Chair has been able to discover, in every instance where an amendment proposed to introduce an entirely new subject it has been excluded. The Chair refers to the Journal of the House, Twenty-seventh Congress, first session, page 223, for a decision by Mr. Speaker White; Journal of the House, Thirtieth Congress, first session, page 737, a decision by Mr. Speaker Winthrop; Journal of the House, Thirtieth Congress, second session, a decision also by Mr. Speaker Winthrop; Journal of the House, Thirty-first Congress, first session, pages 1509 and 1510, a decision by Mr. Speaker Cobb.

Having disposed of the point of order upon the first ground presented, it is unnecessary to express an opinion upon the second ground, and the Chair prefers not to do so.

The fourth clause of Rule XXI provides that "no bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House." Where a proposed amendment differs in any respect from a bill or resolution pending before the House, it will always be more or less difficult to determine whether or not they are substantially the same; and the Chair thinks he ought not to attempt to decide such a question unless it be absolutely necessary to do so.

The point of order is sustained, and the amendment is excluded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Treasury Department—

Mr. McMAHON. I am instructed to put under the head of Treasury Department the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, after line 12, insert the following:

"Internal revenue: For additional amount to pay salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors; for fees and expenses of gaugers, for salaries of storekeepers, and for miscellaneous expenses, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1880, $320,000."

Mr. McMAHON. As I have said, Mr. Chairman, I have been instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to insert this amount. The reason of this I will state to the House in as few words as possible. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has succeeded to a certain extent by means not necessary now to recount in transferring a large number of illicit establishments in this country into regular distilleries, so that we had, for example, in the sixth North Carolina district in 1879 ninety-four distilleries regularly registered, while there were in 1878 only forty-two, and in 1880 in the same district we have two hundred and two. So in the fifth North Carolina district where we had but sixteen in 1878 and twenty-nine in 1879, we have seventy-four in 1880.

At the close of the last fiscal year, there having been appropriated a million and a half of dollars for this purpose for that fiscal year, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue applied to the Committee on Appropriations for a deficiency of $150,000, and it was granted to him; so that the total appropriation last year amounted to $1,650,000, out of which were expended $1,646,506, leaving a small balance in favor of the office. But since that time, as I have already stated, a much larger number of legal distilleries have been started, requiring a much larger number of gaugers, storekeepers, &c. And in view of the growing business of the country, and particularly of this growing business which yields so large a revenue, especially in that section of the country where it has not heretofore yielded so much revenue, the Committee on Appropriations thought it proper that the full amount requisite for salaries for these gaugers and storekeepers and for incidental expenses should be given; and I think the calculation that was made brought it within $2,000 of the amount we have recommended in this bill.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I wish to ask the gentleman how much the committee allowed for the general service?

Mr. McMAHON. That is in a separate amendment, the amount being $25,000.

I shall print with my remarks the statements in detail to which I have adverted. They are as follows:

Statement showing the number of registered grain distilleries in the following districts on the 1st day of January, 1877, 1878, 1879, and 1880.

District.	Number in 1877.	Number in 1878.	Number in 1879.	Number in 1880.

The question being taken on Mr. McMAHON's amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. CLYMER. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to follow the amendment which has just been adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional amount to pay salaries and expenses for collectors of internal revenue, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1880, $25,000.

Mr. CLYMER. In explanation of the necessity of the adoption of this amendment I will state that we appropriated in the bill for this year the sum of $1,800,000 to pay the salaries of collectors and the expenses of their office. At the time of the meeting of Congress there was but a balance of $3,000 on hand, the rest of the appropriation having been distributed to the various collectors throughout the collection districts of the United States. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says that the reason of the impending deficiency is this: that the increase of business throughout the country, making the collections much larger in amount, increases the pay of the collectors in nearly every district of the United States; for gentlemen will remember that the pay of collectors is a fixed sum, and then percentages of the amounts collected, and the amounts collected this year being much larger than formerly, it will require at least this additional sum to pay their salaries.

Again, for the convenience of the public the Commissioner has appointed at different localities, where there are not collection offices, agents for the sale of revenue stamps, giving them in most instances very moderate salaries, employing persons who have fixed employments in fixed places, as, for instance, cashiers of banks, and who require some additional sum to compensate them. The sub-committee were unanimous in recommending the adoption of this amendment.

The question being put on Mr. CLYMER's amendment, it was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph:

Public buildings:

For the completion of the custom-house, court-house, and post-office building, and approaches, at Chicago, Illinois, including steps, grading, sidewalks, and paving, $100,000.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to offer an amendment to come in after the clause just read. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 47 the following:

For completing the custom-house and post-office building at Cincinnati, Ohio, $150,000; said appropriation to be immediately available.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point of order that that amendment is not in order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to ascertain from my friend from Kentucky to what rule this amendment is obnoxious.

Mr. BLACKBURN. To the third clause of the twenty-first rule.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I propose to speak to the point of order. I wish the gentleman to submit his objections to my amendment in regard to the question of order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not propose to argue the point at all. It is so plain that I do not desire to say a word. The gentleman from Ohio can argue it if he pleases.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It does not appear to me so clear as it does to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am willing to submit the point of order for the decision of the Chair without any argument from me.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand this is an appropriation bill providing for a deficiency; that it is not a regular appropriation bill; and hence that the amendment is not obnoxious to the third clause of the twenty-first rule. The erection of the post-office and custom-house building of Cincinnati was authorized years ago. The appropriation of last year was insufficient to provide material for prosecuting that work, and now the work has been suspended for some months by reason of a want of material.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I must ask the gentleman to confine himself to the point of order and not discuss the merits of the amendment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am confining myself to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is trying to show that there is a deficiency for the present fiscal year.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I only insist that he shall not travel beyond the point of order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. When I depart from that the Chair will no doubt call me to order.

Mr. ATKINS. There was not enough appropriated to complete the building, if that is a deficiency.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is very true.

Mr. ATKINS. And it was not intended that that appropriation should complete the building.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I notice that there is in this bill an appropriation for the completion of the custom-house at Chicago. I suppose that comes in under the head of deficiency; whether that is enough to complete the building I do not know.

The granite for the custom-house in Cincinnati is procured in Maine, and until that is provided it is not possible to go on with the prosecution of the work. It was thought that the appropriation last year would be sufficient to keep the workmen constantly employed. It turns out that it was totally and wholly inadequate for that purpose. This appropriation is asked in order that the work provided for by law may be prosecuted; in other words, that the quarrymen in Maine may get out the stone and ship it to Cincinnati for the prosecution of the work on this building.

Now, there is no question that this is a proper thing to do; and a proper thing to do is in order through the instrumentality of the pending bill. I take it that the law authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to press the prosecution of the work on this building, and that appropriations are made for the purpose of furnishing the necessary material to do so.

Mr. BLOUNT. What law?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The law authorizing the construction of the building.

Mr. BLOUNT. What law is there authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to press the construction of the building?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. When I say "press" I mean that the work is to be prosecuted with all proper dispatch and speed, and that appropriations are made for the express purpose of insuring the speedy completion of the building. It is known that the Government is necessarily subjected to a large expense because the building is not completed. The Committee on Appropriations will bear me witness that the appropriation made last year was inadequate for the purpose. Unless this appropriation is made it is impossible to get the stone upon the ground in time to prosecute the work during the coming summer; unless this money is given now we cannot prosecute the work this year. Hence I insist that this is properly a deficiency. It is for the purpose of furnishing the material required in order that the work upon the custom-house building in Cincinnati may progress whenever the season shall have so far advanced that workmen can work upon the building.

Mr. BAILEY. Will not the same rule apply to all the public buildings of the country?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is quite possible that it may.

Mr. EINSTEIN. Then let us have an amendment applying to all of them.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not object to that.

Mr. McMAHON. When the sundry civil appropriation bill comes in, all these buildings will be provided for.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am afraid it will come in everlastingly too late.

The CHAIRMAN. Although the bill under consideration is not technically speaking a general appropriation bill, yet Rule 120 of the old series was always held to apply to bills of this character as well as to original appropriation bills. The difficulty with the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] seems to be that it does not come from any committee having any jurisdiction of the subject. The right of individuals upon their own responsibility to offer amendments to appropriation bills has been very much restricted by the third clause of Rule XXI of the new rules. Without commenting upon that clause, the Chair holds that the amendment is not in order coming from an individual member of the House and not from a committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair permit me to call his attention to the first portion of the third clause of Rule XXI?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. That certainly implies that an amendment "in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress" would be admissible. The custom-house at Cincinnati is a work already in progress, and by inference from the first portion of the third clause of section 21 it would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is now a law making an appropriation for the work upon the Cincinnati custom-house and court-house for the present fiscal year. This bill is one making appropriations for deficiencies only. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] is not to supply any actual deficiency, but to make provision for the completion of the work.

Mr. REED. And that is precisely what is provided for in the first part of clause 3 of Rule XXI.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, when moved as an amendment to a deficiency appropriation bill. If the bill under consideration were the sundry civil appropriation bill, a bill which properly relates to these subjects, the Chair would hold that such an amendment would be in order, although offered by an individual.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Coast and Geodetic Survey:
For the repairs and maintenance of the vessels used in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, $10,000.

Miscellaneous:
For coal, wood, grates, grate-baskets and fixtures, stoves and fixtures, blowers, coal-hods, hearths, shovels, tongs, pokers, matches and match-safes for the Treasury Department, $1,250.

For ice, ice-buckets, file-holders, book-rests, labor, clocks and repairs of the same for the Treasury Department, $1,250.

Mr. ATKINS. By instruction of the Committee on Appropriations I move to amend by inserting after line 57 what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one of the steamers of the revenue marine, now on the Pacific coast, for the relief of the officers and crews of the whaling-barks Mount Wollaston and Vigilant, now imprisoned in the Arctic Ocean; and such sum of money, not exceeding $6,000, as may be necessary to properly strengthen and equip such steam-cutter and to carry out the object of this provision, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. ATKINS. As this amendment indicates, there are a couple of whaling vessels that have been imprisoned in the Arctic waters since last fall, not being able to get out on account of the ice. Their crews are supposed to be in very great danger. The Secretary of the Navy was applied to for a vessel to afford relief to these sailors; but he replied that he had no vessel suitable for those waters. The Secretary of the Treasury was called upon for one of the revenue cutters, of which I believe there are thirty-six; and he consents that one of them shall be designated for this purpose; but it will require some improvement of the prow and the stern, besides repairs of the rudder and rudder-posts. It is estimated by the Superintendent of the Marine Service that $6,000 will be ample for these repairs. The vessel, if repaired, would be able to go into those waters and probably afford relief to those sailors, who, it is expected, when spring shall set in, will leave their vessels so that they may be rescued.

I will add that a vessel belonging to the United States Navy, the Jeannette, is also in those waters, with a crew of about fifty men—probably in the same condition as the crews of those whaling vessels. There are about eighty men on the whaling vessels, and about fifty on the Jeannette. I think the House ought not to hesitate a moment to make this little appropriation of $6,000 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to afford relief by sending out one of the revenue cutters.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of officers of the Marine Corps, $2,000.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT—

Mr. McMAHON. On behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, I offer an amendment to come in under the head of "Interior Department."

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 69 insert:

Pensions:

For pensions for Army invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, survivors of the war of 1812 and widows of the war of 1812, $6,500,000; for pay and allowances for salary, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, light, and postage on official matter directed to the Departments and bureaus at Washington, $15,000; for Navy pensions to invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, $140,000.

Mr. McMAHON. The appropriation here proposed has been made necessary by the act commonly known as the arrearages of pensions law; not for the purpose of paying those whose cases were embraced in the appropriation act of $27,000,000, but to pay those whose cases have been allowed since the statute of limitations was repealed. The sum proposed to be appropriated is large, but it can only be paid out under law; and I think there is no opportunity for improper use of the money.

Mr. REAGAN. Will this amendment admit the payment of pensions to all soldiers of the war of 1812, or will those in the Southern States be excluded?

Mr. McMAHON. The committee propose simply that the money be appropriated, without any legislation in regard to the matter, and without attempting to control the Department in any ruling which it has made. That question was not brought to the attention of the committee; and if it had been, the committee probably could not have acted without subjecting the proposition to a point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. Would the gentleman object to an amendment making the provision apply, notwithstanding existing laws, to all those who would otherwise be entitled under the provisions of the pension act?

Mr. McMAHON. So far as I am concerned, undoubtedly; but I think gentlemen on the other side had better be consulted on that proposition. I will not object to the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I shall ask to amend—

Mr. McMAHON. One moment. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of uneasiness manifested recently in regard to the pension-roll of the United States; but I think we may pass this bill, with this amendment, without much uneasiness. This is not a perpetual burden upon the American people. Many of the men who now receive pensions will undoubtedly pass away in the course of ten or twenty years. Besides, there is this consolation: in granting this money we know that we give it to a class of people who need it; we know that we are circulating the money of the country among the poorer class of our people. Although our pension-roll and the amount of expenditure for pensions may appear large, I call the attention of gentlemen to the important fact that all the money we have expended in this country for pensions, from the foundation of the Government to the present time, will not reach $500,000,000.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McMAHON. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. I see that this bill of which the gentleman has charge proposes, as stated at the end, to appropriate $665,530.50. Now I understand the Committee on Appropriations offer an amendment proposing to increase the aggregate amount to the extent of some $7,000,000. I raise the point of order whether or not this is germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is taken too late.

Mr. McMAHON. The question was not raised in time.

Mr. HOOKER. I raise the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman raises the question of order after the amendment is under consideration by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOOKER. I could not do it until I obtained the floor. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] took the floor as soon as he offered his amendment, and has not yielded it until now.

Mr. McMAHON. I do not think the gentleman was wide awake in making his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was read at the Clerk's desk, and that was the time to make the point of order. The Chair is obliged to recognize at any time a gentleman who rises to make a point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I ask the gentleman from Ohio what the Committee on Appropriations meant by laying upon the tables of members a bill proposing an aggregate appropriation of $665,000, and then offering an amendment to appropriate something like $7,000,000?

Mr. McMAHON. I do not think it makes much difference on what bill an appropriation for the present fiscal year should come in.

Mr. HOOKER. Does the Chair rule the point of order comes too late?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the point of order comes too late.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. GARFIELD. I object, if it was not made in time.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the Chair by unanimous consent would entertain the point of order, but the gentleman from Ohio objects it comes too late.

Mr. ATKINS. I think the remark the gentleman from Mississippi has made is a proper one to make, for it does look a little singular we should come in here with an appropriation bill, a deficiency appropriation bill, stating it appropriates only $665,530.50, and then come forward with an amendment appropriating between six and seven millions of dollars. That enormous increase in one single amendment looks a little singular and needs explanation.

But the explanation is very simple, Mr. Chairman, and it is this: The Committee on Appropriations when this bill was drafted had not these statistics before them, or at least they did not have sufficient data to enable them to include this item, and as the committee were anxious to get this important deficiency bill into the House as soon as possible, it was reported without it. The sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations was authorized to examine this matter and make their report to the general committee, which they did; and then the general committee authorized it to make this amendment to the bill when it came up for consideration. As the gentleman from Mississippi will see, it is a simple matter of dollars and cents with which the committee had to do.

Mr. HOOKER. And a great many dollars and cents.

Mr. ATKINS. A great many, I admit; but it is in pursuance of law which this Congress had passed. The Committee on Appropriations have simply reported the amount necessary under the estimate to execute the law now upon the statute-book.

Mr. McMAHON. As I said before, the total amount we have appropriated for pensions from the foundation of the Government, if I am correct in my figures, will not exceed $500,000,000. I could lay my hands on a single act passed in the history of this Congress, within my recollection, voting money into the hands of people who did not need it as these people do, and I hope there will be a unanimous vote on this proposition.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is this amendment a deficiency of last year's appropriation, or is it for this fiscal year?

Mr. McMAHON. I will state to the gentleman when the estimates were made and the original appropriation bill was passed for this fiscal year, as I understand it, the bill had not been passed out of which this deficiency grew.

Mr. ATKINS. The Commissioner of Pensions reported an estimate for $5,000,000, but applications came in for arrearages of pensions so fast that estimate had to be increased over a million and a half, creating the necessity for this large item.

The CHAIRMAN. It is impossible to hear at the desk what is going on between gentlemen. The rule requires gentlemen shall address the Chair.

Mr. ATKINS. I beg the Chair's pardon; I was explaining to the gentleman from Mississippi in reference to a point which he raised against the pending amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to have the amendment read again referring to pensions so we may know exactly what it is.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call attention to the fact that this amendment is intended for the benefit of the soldiers of the war of 1812. By section 4616 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that no money on account of pensions shall be paid to any person or to the widow or children or heirs of any deceased person who, in any way, engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States. The persons intended to have the benefit of this law are persons who were too old to have participated in that contest; and, although they may have, in sympathy, participated with the people among whom they lived, the services which they rendered helped this country in a war which has been called the second war of independence with the like patriotism, with the like devotion of those who served in that war from other portions of the Union. Of these gallant men there are but few left; they are dying from age, infirmity, and many of them are in poverty. It seems to me they are all alike entitled to the bounty of the Government wherever they may happen to live, and that this amendment providing for this class of meritorious pensioners in one part of the country and denying relief to others in another part of the country ought to be so amended as to include all. If the gentleman will consent to make the provisions of his amendment apply to all these pensioners notwithstanding the section of the Revised Statutes which I have quoted, then I will gladly support it. If he shall refuse to do so, then I hope the whole proposition will be now defeated and come up hereafter in a separate bill so the judgment of this House can be better taken on it. Surely we will not pursue the aged and decrepit, those trembling on the verge of the grave, and deny them the bounty of the Government which they served in the days of its weakness and peril. There seems to be something in it so wrong, something so repulsive to our common sense of right and justice, it ought not to be asked for any unless justice is done alike to all. I have not time to prepare an amendment now, but I shall ask to offer one hereafter providing that all shall be paid notwithstanding the provisions of the section of the law to which I have referred.

Mr. HISCOCK. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKEE. Are you going to raise the point on what I am going to say on the bill?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, but on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. My point is that the amendment is not germane; that while increasing the appropriation it changes existing law. I do not desire to discuss the merits of the bill. I do not desire to answer the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, but it seems to me—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has obtained the floor to make objection, but the amendment against which he makes his point of order has been under consideration for some time.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not so understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has not yet offered any amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I will prepare it.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say in response to what has fallen from my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman who has this bill in charge, that it does not seem to me to be proper in this House at this time in considering a bill, printed and laid on our table for some time and which proposes simply to make an appropriation in the nature of a deficiency in the sum of $665,530.50, to ask the House now to amend that proposition by adding an appropriation in payment of arrearages of pension amounting to nearly $7,000,000. And I say this is not proper for this reason, Mr. Chairman: By a single bill, which this House passed during this session of Congress, some thirty-two or thirty-three millions of dollars were voted, and probably the amount of appropriations for arrearages of pensions will altogether, before we get through with them, reach between sixty and seventy millions of dollars. If deficiencies have been incurred, I insist it is not proper they should go on this bill for this purpose, but that they shall wait an appropriation hereafter to be made by Congress for that particular purpose. In one single bill, sir, as I have said, passed by this House of Congress, some $33,000,000 were appropriated for arrearages of pensions and appropriated, I believe, by the almost unanimous vote of gentlemen on this side of the House—without a dissenting voice, as I am told. I say, therefore, if there is a deficiency, and if there is money necessary to pay these pensions, let them wait a proper bill being reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I rose too late in the judgment of the Chair and in the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio, who has this bill in charge, to make objection that the amendment proposed was not germane to the subject-matter of the bill. And, indeed, it was an amendment which seemed to be an addition to the bill so disproportionate to the object the committee had in view that I am surprised to hear either from the chairman or the gentleman having the bill in charge that you propose even to consider an amendment to add an expenditure of $7,000,000 to a bill which simply proposes to supply deficiencies to the amount of some six hundred and odd thousand dollars. I say, therefore, that I do not think it proper that the committee should be called upon to pass upon the question, and if called upon to pass upon it at all, the Committee of the Whole should take the responsibility of saying we will not allow any committee, whether the Appropriation Committee or any other committee, to present a bill and lay it on the desk for the consideration of members which proposes to supply deficiencies in the different departments of the Government, whatever sum may be necessary, and then incorporate an amendment in it amounting to $7,000,000. In other words we ought to have a specific bill for this purpose. The bill appropriating this amount should be entirely separate. If there is a deficiency in the Treasury on account of appropriations already made for the payment of arrearages of pensions let that fact be presented in a separate bill and let it go upon that as a separate measure whenever it shall be presented. I do not wish to be understood that I will oppose any appropriation bill for pensions. On the contrary I have stood on this floor, and every southern man on this side of the House has stood on this floor, after the war waged in defense of the Union out of which the Government acquired a large area of territory from which was carved State after State—I say I have stood here on this floor for the general principle that all those men who have risked their lives in defense of this Government, and the widows of men who have lost their lives in defense of their country should be pensioned. And yet I have not been able to get that bill through the House or through the Senate. And still I am not disposed to deny to the men entitled to it what is sought by the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas, and I think it is right that the men who rendered services to the country shall be pensioned and that the widows of the men who fell should be supported. Still we have the right to ask that the pension shall be applicable as well to the soldiers of the Mexican war and to their widows as any others. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. I now desire to offer my amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the amendment on which I desire to make the point of order.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the provisions of this section shall extend to all pensioners of the United States referred to in this section, and that the provisions of section 4716 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply for the exclusion of any from the benefit of its provisions.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order on that.

Mr. HISCOCK. On this question of the point of order I make it without intending in any way to consider the questions already considered and the reasons urged why the provisions to which the gentleman from Texas has referred should be repealed. Now, sir, there has been legislation on this very subject. What it is I do not know; what I say is that it will be illy advised on an appropriation of this kind to attempt to change existing law and enact a new law without its having been properly considered by a committee and reported upon. Therefore it is that I make the point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before that is submitted I desire to have read, and I think it is germane to this question, sections 5 and 6 of the law passed March 9, 1878, which repeals this section 4716.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the names of all persons now surviving heretofore pensioned on account of service in the war of 1812 against Great Britain or for service in any of the Indian wars, and whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862; and that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, and section 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall not apply to the persons provided for by this act: Provided, That no money shall be paid to any one on account of pensions for the time during which his name remained stricken from the rolls.

SEC. 6. That the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1812, where the name of said pensioner was stricken from the pension-roll in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-roll the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and where, under the existing provisions of law, said pensioner died without his name being restored to the roll, shall be entitled to make claim for a pension as such widow after the passage of this act: Provided, That no such arrearages shall be paid for any period prior to the time of the removal of the disability of the pensioner, as provided in section 5: And provided further, That under this act any widow of a revolutionary soldier who served for fourteen days or was in any engagement shall be placed on the pension-roll of the United States and receive a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

SEC. 7. That all laws and clauses of laws in conflict with this act be, and they are hereby, repealed.

Approved March 9, 1878.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit that relieves the difficulty my friend from Texas refers to.

Mr. DIBRELL. In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, I wish to say that the Commissioner of Pensions does withhold pensions under the act of February 19, 1861, except to soldiers who proved their loyalty; that on the question of letters which came to him as Commissioner of Pensions he has refused to pay them.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make the point of order that the only thing which can properly be discussed is the point of order that has been made upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is simply as to the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that this amendment is liable to the point of order.

I believe it is just as germane to provide for the relief of the soldiers of the war of 1812, who have been relieved by law of their disability, as it is to provide for other pensioners; and I had just sent to the Library for the law on that point in order to have it read from the Clerk's desk just as my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] had the law read. The law has relieved soldiers of the war of 1812 who labored under disabilities by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. Here is a proposition to appropriate $6,650,000 to cover a supposed deficiency for the present fiscal year arising out of the arrears of pensions act. Now, sir, I would like any gentleman to show me how that proposition which is now before the committee is not as liable to the point of order as the proposition offered by the gentleman from Texas; for the proposition that he offers is in accordance with the law as far as that is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the proposition of the gentleman from Texas is to repeal certain laws. This is an important point of order coming up for decision for the first time, as the Chair thinks, under the new rules. The Chair would therefore like to call attention of gentlemen to the exact point and hear their views upon it, because the Chair is exceedingly anxious in making the first ruling under this rule to be correct.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations does not change any existing law but makes an appropriation for a deficiency, whereas the amendment which the gentleman from Texas proposes does change existing law. The Chair therefore desires to call the attention of gentlemen to that difference between the amendments and to the new language, if the Chair may use the expression, of the third clause of Rule XXI in reference to the right of individual members on the floor to offer amendments.

Mr. REAGAN. May I say a word there?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] was addressing the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire only further to say that I am not familiar with the language of the new rule, but I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I gave, I think, an excellent reason why I could not withdraw the point of order. The gentleman from Georgia has had read statutory provisions, by which it would seem to be clear that no such amendment as is proposed is necessary. The gentleman from Tennessee has been to the Library and comes here with some statutes which seem to make it necessary. The gentleman from Texas is of that view. Now, shall we waive the point of order without knowing what the law is; without knowing what amendments, if any, to the law are necessary? I say this is a sufficient excuse to me for insisting on the point of order without entering on any discussion of the merits of the proposition.

Mr. REAGAN. On the subject of the point of order I desire to say that the amendment I offer proposes simply to follow the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, by the application of its provisions to all alike, notwithstanding the provisions of section 4716 of the Revised Statutes. But if the two sections of the act of 1878, read at the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] are the law—and that I submit is a question that the Chairman himself may look at to determine if it is the law—then my amendment would not change existing law, and therefore would not be liable to the point of order made by the gentleman from New York.

I may to some extent have been influenced by understanding from members on this floor that notwithstanding the act of 1878 the Commissioner of Pensions refuses to permit the law to apply to that class of pensioners. What are his reasons for so doing I know not. Hence it was I offered the amendment that the provisions of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio should apply to all notwithstanding the provision contained in the Revised Statutes. I do not know how that may influence the mind of the Chair, but I submit the Chair may look to the act of 1878 and see whether under that act it is the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to place these pensioners upon the rolls. If so, my amendment would not change existing law, and is therefore relieved from the effect of the point of order.

A MEMBER. Do you propose to withdraw the amendment, that being the law?

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, no. If the point of order is made on the amendment and is sustained, I trust the gentleman from Ohio in the exercise of his judgment will withdraw his amendment, because I will say if this is simply to apply to pensioners of a certain class in one part of the country, and their claims are once satisfied, that makes it more difficult afterward to satisfy the claims of those in another portion of the country.

Mr. HISCOCK. The language of the rule is:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

It seems to me that excludes this amendment. If no law is changed, then there is no need for the provision which the gentleman from Texas has offered. If he proposes to change existing laws, then the amendment comes within the very letter of the clause I have read.

Mr. BUCKNER. If I understand correctly the effect of the amendment which the gentleman from Texas desires to present, instead of diminishing it will increase expenditures very largely and will add largely to the pension-roll, on which there is already necessarily a large number of fraudulent cases. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is intended to provide for arrearages of pensions to Union soldiers, and the law as to pensions to Union soldiers gives what was not given to pensioners for the war of 1812—it gives pensions to dependent relatives.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that he misunderstands the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON.] His amendment is limited exclusively to the soldiers of the war of 1812 and the widows of such soldiers, and has nothing to do with the soldiers of the late war.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is entirely mistaken. The amendment applies to the soldiers of the late war, and only to them.

Mr. REAGAN. Perhaps I did not hear it distinctly when it was read. Why were the soldiers of the war of 1812 referred to in that amendment?

Mr. ATKINS. I am speaking of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON.]

Mr. REAGAN. And that is the one I am speaking of.

Mr. ATKINS. It does not apply to the soldiers of the war of 1812 at all.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that it be again read, for either I do not understand it or the gentlemen do not.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to be understood that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is for the benefit of the soldiers of the late war, and not the soldiers of the war of 1812.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it relates to soldiers of both wars.

Mr. REAGAN. Let it be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again read.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. McMAHON, as follows:

For pensions for Army invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, survivors of the war of 1812 and widows of the war of 1812, $6,500,000.

For pay and allowance for salary, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, light, and postage on official matter directed to the Departments and bureaus at Washington, $15,000.

For Navy pensions of invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, $140,000.

Mr. REAGAN. That is the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the provisions of this section shall extend to all pensioners of the classes referred to in this section, and that the provisions of section 4716 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply for the exclusion of any from the benefit of its provisions.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] who has charge of this bill, to explain to the House just how this deficiency arose.

Mr. McMAHON. With the permission of the House I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order pending.

Mr. McMAHON. I understand that.

Mr. CALKINS. Let the point of order be first decided.

Mr. McMAHON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had hoped that he would not be called upon to rule upon the new part of the third clause of Rule XXI, without having the benefit of the views of such gentlemen upon the floor as desire to express them.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I would suggest that the committee now rise if the Chair would prefer that the decision of the point of order be deferred.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not ask that.

Mr. McMAHON. If the Chair would like to have further time to examine the point of order, I will move that the committee rise, although I would like to have this bill finished this evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not ask the committee to rise upon his account, although he would prefer to hear the views of gentlemen upon this clause of the rule, because it is an important one.

Mr. McMAHON. Then I will not make the motion.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. McMAHON. I hope that will not be done. This is an unusually important bill. There are people out of employment who will continue so every day that we delay action upon this bill.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the question upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to; upon a division—ayes 106, noes 63.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4924) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time to the pending bill in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope there will be no objection to that; I want to see what the amendment is.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

For special deputy marshals of elections, the sum of $7,600: Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections and general deputy marshals, for performing any duties in reference to any election, shall receive the sum of $2 per day in full for their compensation; and that all appointments of such special deputy marshals or of general deputy marshals having any duty to perform in respect to any election shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the district judge, in the absence of the circuit judge, and not less than two nor more than three appointments shall be made for any voting precinct where such appointments are required to be made, and the persons so appointed shall be of different political parties, of good character, and able to read and write the English language, and shall be well-known residents of the voting precinct in which their duties are to be performed.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I propose to offer.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Pensions shall not withhold a pension from any soldier or pensioner of the war of 1812 who was granted a pension under the act of Congress of 1871, and was dropped for charges of disloyalty and reinstated under act of 9th March, 1878, and their pensions shall be paid from 9th March, 1878.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1489) to remove the political disabilities of Roger A. Pryor, of New York; also, a bill (S. No. 1280) for the purpose of erecting an elevator in the United States court and Federal offices at Indianapolis, Indiana; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the House now adjourn.

PUEBLO OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to House bill No. 4928, to confirm the survey of the pueblo of San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MRS. LAURA NICHOLLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting papers in the Indian depredation claim of Mrs. Laura Nicholls; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SANDUSKY RIVER, OHIO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the improvement of the Sandusky River below Fremont, Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PATAPSCO RIVER, MARYLAND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to an appropriation for the improvement of the Patapsco River, Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CHITTENDEN, for three days.

The motion of Mr. HOOKER was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

By Mr. WILLIAM ALDRICH: The petition of Albert W. Landon, publisher of the Humane Journal, Chicago, Illinois, for the abolition of the duty on type—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ARMFIELD: The petition of J. J. Bruner, publisher of the Carolina Watchman, Salisbury, North Carolina, of similar import—to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1880.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY T. SHARP, of Alexandria, Virginia.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to an amendment of the Journal. Last night, immediately after the taking up of the bill to establish titles in the Hot Springs, I asked and obtained unanimous consent to take up the bill for the distribution of the Geneva award that I might move an amendment thereto and have said amendment pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands from the Secretary that that was done by unanimous consent and was not upon motion, and he is not in the habit of journalizing such understandings.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is done by unanimous consent is not journalized.

Mr. HOAR. Is not the Journal of the Senate to show the fact that a certain matter was taken up for consideration, that an amendment was moved and is pending, merely because nobody objected to it? I think that a special reason why it should be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Did the Senator offer an amendment or give notice of an amendment he intended to propose?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly I offered it.

Mr. GARLAND. The statement of the amendment appears on page 7 of to-day's RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. I am not talking about the RECORD; I am talking about the Journal. I do not understand that a unanimous consent to do something in the future is journalized. That is a matter which is merely binding upon the honor of the Senators who join in the unanimous consent. But this was a taking up of certain business for action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The present incumbent did not occupy the chair at the time. He understands from the Secretary that the amendment was received, the Senator stating that he intended to propose it.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir. My reason for calling the attention of the Chair to it is that it is erroneously stated in the RECORD. I distinctly moved to take up the bill for the distribution of the Geneva award in order that I might then move an amendment and have the amendment pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair now understands the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I now move that the Journal be corrected accordingly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal will be corrected so as to state the fact.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I rise to a correction of the Journal. I understood the Secretary to read that the bill (S. No. 549) for the relief of Samuel I. Gustin, on motion, was postponed until to-day. I understood that the bill was objected to by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and under the operation of the Anthony rule went over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the understanding of the Chair. The bill was passed over regularly, and lost its place until another call of the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It does not so appear in the Journal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is reminded that the bill was passed over without prejudice, the Senator from Vermont remarking that, having the privilege to object at any time, he would assent to the arrangement that it should be passed over without prejudice, so that it would come up on the regular call of the Calendar to-day.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Chair refers to another bill, a bill in which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is interested, for the erection of a public building at Denver, I think.

Mr. TELLER. No; but the bill (S. No. 769) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, was the bill the Senator from Vermont said might pass over without prejudice, although I observe that in the Calendar printed this morning it has gone off the Calendar, thus losing its place.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont said, "Let the bill go over." Therefore the Chair said, "Let the next bill on the Calendar be called," showing that the bill referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin lost its place upon the Calendar. Then the next bill was taken up, relative to cotton cordage in the Navy, and pending its consideration the morning hour expired and the Senate proceeded to the unfinished business. The Chair will observe that by looking at the middle of the sixth page of the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal will be corrected in the way suggested.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Colonel John E. Smith, Fourteenth Infantry, and other commissioned officers stationed at Fort Douglas, Utah Territory, praying for the repeal of the law in regard to payment by officers for fuel; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present a petition which, being very brief, I will read:

To the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of the city of Terre Haute, in the State of Indiana, would respectfully petition your honorable body to make an appropriation for the purpose of purchasing a lot and erecting thereon a suitable post-office building in said city.

We ask this in view of the fact that Terre Haute distributes the largest amount of mail matter of any city in the State except two and pays the largest amount of revenue to the Government of any city in the State.

James M. Allen, Hoberg, Root & Co.; Newton Rogers, P. Shannon, C. Y. Patterson, Charles Craft, B. W. Hanna, Wm. Mack, John E. Lamb, S. H. Potter, Albert J. Kelley, F. C. Donaldson, John W. Davis, A. B. Carleton, Wm. E. McLean, Ed. Seldemridge, C. W. Barbour, Cox & Fairbanks, Wm. C. Ball, Preston Hussey, H. Hulman, Samuel S. Early, Demas Deming, J. H. O'Boyle, Samuel Royce, Jno. G. Williams, W. B. Tuell, Thomas H. Nelson, H. H. Boudinot, D. W. Minshall, Sam. Magill, Havens & Geddes, John G. Shryer, N. Filbeck, W. B. Warren, Thomas B. Long.

The petition is signed by thirty-six of the most prominent citizens of Terre Haute. They represent men in every position of life, of great wealth, and high character. I call the especial attention of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to this subject, to which committee I move the reference of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of John W. Hoffman, praying the passage of Senate bill No. 1455, authorizing the President to appoint him a second lieutenant in the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I present the petition of W. C. Smith and 59 other citizens of Marshall County, Iowa, who state that some twenty or more Indians of the Pottawatomie tribe located in Kansas are now and have been for some time living in Marshall County, Iowa. They own small tracts of land there, and are engaged in cultivating the land and trying to live a civilized life. They do not wish to go and live with the remnant of their tribe in Kansas, and wish to have their ratable proportion of the annuities payable to the tribe paid to them. The petitioners pray that that be done, and that any expense which may be incurred by the Government in consequence of granting their prayer may be taken out of the annuities to be paid to these Indians. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the petition of the Lippitt Woolen Manufacturing Company, C. H. Merriman, treasurer, of Manchester, Rhode Island, praying for the repeal of the prohibitory duties upon chrome iron ore and bichromate of potash; and a large number of other citizens join in the petition. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the memorial of ten rectifiers and distillers in Hamilton County, Ohio, protesting against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4812) to amend the laws in relation to internal revenue; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of William S. Hansell & Sons, of Philadelphia, praying for the payment of an allowance recommended by the Quartermaster-General and the Third Auditor; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Henry F. Knapp, of New York, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Sandy Hook bar on a plan suggested by him; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present, according to the leave given by the Senate the other day, the views of the minority of the Judiciary Committee on the bill (S. No. 1421) to make the crime of rape in the District of Columbia punishable with death, reported by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. THURMAN.] I ask that the views of the minority be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be received and printed under the rule.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1230) to establish a port of delivery at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1497) to amend section 2630 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so that appraisers shall be authorized to act by deputy in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and the accompanying letter of the Secretary of the Treasury was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1371) to authorize the Mississippi River Logging Company to construct and operate sheer-booms at or near Straight Slough, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CALL, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 846) for the relief of Ira Gill, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 841) making an appropriation for the base and pedestal of a monument to the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont, United States Navy, reported it with an amendment.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of the Army Register be printed for the use of the Senate.

NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following resolution, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of the last edition of the Navy Register be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator if this is the usual number that has been printed?

Mr. ANTHONY. The usual number has been from five hundred to eight hundred, I think. The resolution now reported provides for printing a thousand copies. The cost will be less than $100.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why is there any necessity for a larger number than usual?

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator desires, I will submit to an amendment reducing the number.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I do not desire that. I simply want to know why we are to increase the number; that is all.

Mr. ANTHONY. It gives a little more to Senators. The edition was exhausted and many Senators have constant applications for the Navy Register.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HEREFORD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1498) to grant an American register to a foreign-built ship for the purpose of scientific exploration; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1499) to provide for holding a term of the district court of the United States at Wichita, Kansas, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1500) for the relief of J. W. Newman, administrator of Jacob Newman, deceased, of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 94) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of claims of certain foreign steamship companies arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage duties; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HEREFORD, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Charles B. Phillips be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

YAQUINA BAY, OREGON.

Mr. SLATER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate with all data in the possession of the Department of Engineers of the United States respecting the entrance to Yaquina Bay, Oregon, showing the depth and width of the channel and the character of obstructions thereto, and particularly a copy of the report of Captain Woods of an examination and survey of the entrance of said harbor, made in December, 1879, by direction of the board of engineers for the Pacific coast.

POWER OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. KIRKWOOD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire and report what is the power of the Postmaster-General under existing law: first, to modify existing contracts for carrying the mail over established routes by increasing or diminishing the number of trips over such routes or to annul the same; second, to require an increase or diminution of the speed at which the mail is carried by existing contracts; third, to contract for service on routes established by law on which service has not been provided; also the law or rules governing the change of compensation to be paid in all such cases; also the rule for service for special post-offices, with such changes in existing law in all or any of these matters as the committee may deem advisable, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

RIVERS IN MISSISSIPPI AND ALABAMA.

On motion of Mr. GORDON, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives for its consideration the letter of the Secretary of War and of the Chief of Engineers in reference to examinations of the Noxubee River, Mississippi, and Choctawhatchee River, Alabama.

COTTON CORDAGE IN THE NAVAL SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed, under the order of the day, to call the Calendar of General Orders, commencing at the point reached when last under consideration.

The bill (S. No. 1281) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to introduce cotton cordage into the naval service of the United States was announced as being the first in order upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill having been considered yesterday as in Committee of the Whole and reported to the Senate, the pending question is on concurring in the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3, after the word "authorized," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out "and directed;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to introduce into the naval service rope and cordage manufactured of cotton according to the process of Thomas W. Dunham, of Boston, to such an extent as will furnish a fair test of the value and efficiency thereof as compared with the kinds now in use: Provided, however, That said Dunham shall have no claim whatever against the United States or any Department thereof, and shall receive no compensation on account thereof.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I trust that the amendment will not be concurred in. It will defeat the whole object of the bill. It is well known that heretofore ship cordage has not been manufactured out of cotton, on account of its liability to contract or expand upon exposure to the weather. Recent processes pretend to have remedied that defect by manufacturing it in such a manner, in combination with tar and pitch, as to prevent its expansion or contraction, and make it quite as solid as hempen cordage. If that is so, and it can be introduced into general use, it will have a tendency to reduce the price of ship cordage 50 per cent., and will, as I explained to the Senate yesterday, have a tendency to enhance the value of that staple.

The objection made to the bill yesterday was very proper, perhaps, that it required the particular process of some one individual. There is no intention to give any individual an advantage in the manufacture of this kind of cordage. There is no patent upon the process that I know of, and there is no possibility for a job in it that I can see. I will move, when the Senate shall have voted upon the amendment now pending, to strike out the words "according to the process of Thomas W. Dunham, of Boston," and insert the words "recent methods," which will give the Secretary of the Navy a fair opportunity of testing any method for the manufacture of cotton cordage with the improvements that have been made.

To strike out the words I have indicated would leave the law just as I apprehend it stands now, that the Secretary of the Navy could introduce this cordage into the Navy if he saw proper. The Secretary of the Navy, it will be remembered, is simply the guardian of the interests of the Navy, and he might well decline to test every invention that might be brought to his notice by any citizen of the United States; but Congress is the guardian of the whole country, and Congress, it seems to me, might well interfere and direct the testing of this improvement in the interest of one of the greatest staples of the Union, the greatest textile fabric in the world, and which constitutes a large portion of the industries and wealth of a great number of our people. Congress might well interfere and instruct the Secretary of the Navy to make a test which will not involve the Government in any great cost in favor of this method, and without specifying any individual or any particular process to be tested.

For these reasons I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator from North Carolina takes his seat, I should like to make an inquiry. Has this subject ever been brought to the notice of the Navy Department?

Mr. VANCE. It has been. The honorable the Secretary of the Navy was before the committee when this bill was discussed, and it met his concurrence.

Mr. CONKLING. And may I inquire further, does the Secretary of the Navy refuse to make tests of the value of cotton cordage?

Mr. VANCE. As I remarked yesterday, I do not know that he has ever refused, but the parties who presented their petition have stated that they had requested him to make the tests, and he had not done so. I do not know that he has ever stubbornly refused.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he can speak of the fact itself? Has not the Secretary of the Navy caused tests to be made of cotton cordage?

Mr. VANCE. That I do not know; I am not informed as to whether or not that is the fact. I only know that the Secretary of the Navy was present when the petition on which is founded this bill was read before him and was discussed in his presence, and such a bill met his assent.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know that tests have been made of cotton cordage, but I am informed that they have been.

Mr. EATON. I will state to my friend from New York that the Secretary of the Navy said to me nearly a month ago that he would cause those tests to be made. Whether he has so caused them to be made, I am not aware.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator from Connecticut in very brief phrase furnishes all the commentary needed on this bill. The Senator from North Carolina says that cotton is one of the great staples of the country. It is so, undoubtedly. You know, sir, as I do, that cheese is one of the great productions of the country; and there are a great many men who believe that cheese can be so treated and prepared that it would be a most valuable addition to the ration in the Navy and in the Army; that it could be made to endure all temperatures and all climates. Why do I not introduce a bill directing the Secretary of War and directing the Secretary of the Navy to put cheese, as a test, among the rations of the Army and the Navy? There are a great many eggs laid in this country, and there are people who believe that desiccated eggs and eggs treated otherwise would last eternally, for aught I know, and could be carried everywhere and kept fresh, and that they would be most valuable additions to the prepared food used by the Army and the Navy and in other branches of the public service. Why not have a bill directing one of those Departments to try the experiment of taking eggs around the world and seeing whether they would mellow, as wine does, or whether something else would happen; and so on to the end of the chapter?

I hope this amendment will be sustained, because if it is not, I conceive that it would be not only a license but an invitation and a sort of requirement of every member of this body, who knows anything about an industry which might be benefited in this way, to bring in a bill giving congressional direction to departmental officers to go on and experiment and test all of these various things to be eaten and employ an expert to examine all the various things to be used in the economy of the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—20.
Allison,	Conkling,	Hoar,	Platt,
Baldwin,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Blair,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,	Windom.

NAYS—33.
Anthony,	Garland,	Kernan,	Vance,
Bayard,	Gordon,	McPherson,	Vest,
Beck,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Burnside,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker,
Call,	Hereford,	Pendleton,	Williams,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,	Withers.
Coke,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Farley,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Ferry,	Kellogg,	Slater,

ABSENT—23.
Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Pryor,
Blaine,	Davis of W. Va.,	Kirkwood,	Sharon,
Booth,	Eaton,	Lamar,	Thurman,
Bruce,	Groome,	Logan,	Wallace,
Butler,	Grover,	McDonald,	Whyte.
Carpenter,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,

So the amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. VANCE. I now offer the amendment of which I gave notice. In line 5, after the word "the," I move to strike out all to and including the word "Boston," in line 6, and insert "recent methods;" so that the bill will read:

That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized and directed to introduce into the naval service rope and cordage manufactured of cotton according to the recent methods, to such an extent as will furnish a fair test of the value and efficiency thereof as compared with the kinds now in use.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the proviso added to the bill in Committee of the Whole been concurred in in the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question will be put separately upon concurring in that amendment if the Senator desires. The Chair was treating it as concurred in, no objection having been made.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not care for a separate vote. I simply desire to know whether the Senate has concurred in the amendment which was added to the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair declared yesterday when the bill came into the Senate that the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole would be concurred in unless objection was made. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina and agreed to was made in the Senate this morning.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT subsequently said: The Chair wishes to call the attention of the Senate to the bill which passed a few moments since, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to introduce cotton cordage into the naval service of the United States. An amendment was adopted which struck out the name of Thomas W. Dunham and inserted "recent methods." The proviso adopted does not apply to the bill in that shape. The proviso is:

Provided, however, That said Dunham shall have no claim whatever against the United States or any department thereof, and shall receive no compensation on account thereof.

The Chair suggests—

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it read "no person shall have any claim."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the bill will be so amended.

NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

The bill (S. No. 1282) to incorporate the National Educational Association was announced as being next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that this bill was recommitted upon the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and my colleague, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] It is now made so as to confine the operations of the association as a corporation to the District of Columbia. Therefore, I suppose it will not meet with any objection. It is merely an educational association that prints once a year its proceedings, essays, and reports upon the various topics embraced in all branches of education. It is a modest and very useful association, and all it desires is to hold property to the amount of $50,000 that parties propose to donate in order that it may publish its annual volume.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if these gentlemen have not the perfect legal and constitutional right to do without any act of Congress all they are asking Congress to authorize them to do?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir—

Mr. COCKRELL. Why is there any necessity for congressional legislation?

Mr. MORRILL. The necessity arises from the fact that they want to hold this donation to the extent of $50,000 to enable them to publish their annual volume. Certainly neither the Senator from Missouri nor any other Senator can have the slightest objection to the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator say that this is intended to operate solely in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MORRILL. As I said, the bill has been confined to the District of Columbia, according to the suggestions of my colleague and of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. INGALLS. I presume the Senator is aware that there is a general incorporation act for the District providing that parties may incorporate here for the purposes stated by the act.

Mr. MORRILL. But this is not one of the purposes included in that act.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rise to a point of order. Let the bill be read. We do not know what the bill is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has not yet been read. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. From what committee does the bill come, if I may inquire?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. From the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CONKLING. It is a bill the objects of which seem to me most useful, party-wise and otherwise. If the amount of education should be dispensed that is provided for in the bill, there would not be a democrat left in the country, I take it. [Laughter.] Therefore I should like to have it adopted; but I should think that one or two of the provisions were very broad indeed under any authority that I supposed Congress had. I think I shall venture to suggest that the bill lie over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over for the day.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from New York will not object to the bill. It was up once before.

Mr. CONKLING. Did the Senator report it?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, and all the objections made by the Senator from Illinois and my colleague have been removed from the bill. It is reported unanimously by the Committee on Education and Labor. It is a mere trivial matter to allow this association to receive donations so that they can publish to the world in something besides the informal mode of newspaper reports a record of their proceedings. Any gentleman who has seen one of the six or eight volumes that they have published I am sure would not object. Among other documents there is a report of the president of Harvard University, another one by the president of Princeton College, and by various educators of the country, that are of exceeding great value. I cannot suppose that there can be any valid objection to the authorization that is proposed here of allowing these gentlemen who have been so usefully employed for many years to receive donations to enable them to publish their annual volumes without going around to beg a couple of thousand dollars from a gentleman here and another there, in order that they may distribute a correct account of their proceedings.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I withdraw the objection, at least for a moment, to enable myself to understand, by the aid of the Senator from Vermont, something about this bill. I wish to know if I am right in my understanding in these respects: The association is to be "the National Educational Association in and of the District of Columbia." Does the Senator understand that its operations are to be confined to this District?

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that so far as the holding of property is concerned, they will be entirely confined to this District. So far as the exercise of their corporate rights in that respect is concerned, they will be entirely confined to this District. I do suppose they would have a right to adjourn and hold a meeting in New York, as they have done at Saratoga, and at Chicago, and at various other places, merely for the purpose of listening to the report and discussing the various subjects that come up annually before the association.

Mr. CONKLING. I supposed that the Senator from Vermont understood the bill as he has now stated it. I am quite sure my understanding of it is as different from his as could well be, and I think if Senators will look at it they will find that it is a very different thing from that described by the Senator.

* In the first place it proposes to incorporate a large number of individuals of both sexes, who are named, and then to incorporate also "the officers and members"—not naming them—"of the association known as 'The National Educational Association,' and their successors." That is the first feature of it to which I call attention, that a large number of individuals named are to be incorporated, and then a large number of other unnamed individuals are to be incorporated, and then their unnamed successors, at any time hereafter to be, are incorporated. I submit to the honorable Senator from Vermont that that is a very wide scope of incorporation.

When they are incorporated the "association shall have power to make and amend its constitution, by-laws, and rules, consistently with law," and what else?

And to hold, by purchase, grant, gift, or otherwise, real or personal estate not exceeding $50,000 in value.

That does not mean real or personal estate to be donated merely; it does not mean real estate to lie within the District of Columbia, but it means, I submit, real estate which may lie in Portland, Maine, or in Portland, Oregon, or anywhere between. It does not mean personal property to be used for educational purposes, but it means bank stock, insurance stock, choses in action, any sort of thing which is personal property or real estate. Whether if it were mixed property it would fall within this, would be a question; but certainly any personal property, no matter for what purpose held, no matter where held, would be within this permission if I understand the bill, and I make these suggestions subject of course to the better knowledge of Senators who have looked further at the bill.

Then it provides that twenty-five members out of all this multitude which no man can number—which is literally true because no man can ascertain from this bill how many persons there are among the officers and members of this other association named, and their successors—twenty-five of this unnumbered multitude of incorporators "shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business." That I take it to mean "of all business," purchasing real estate, selling real estate, purchasing personal property, selling it, exchanging it, doing whatever may fall within the province of this permission.

And that said association shall meet and organize under this charter on the 1st Monday of July, 1880, and annually thereafter shall meet at such time and place as it may designate.

I think that that is not only an unusual charter, but at all events a charter of very different dimensions and very different capabilities from those indicated by the Senator from Vermont. I do not know of any instance in which an act of incorporation approaching this has been granted by Congress, and I certainly should not be willing to vote for it without an opportunity to look at it and to hear it discussed as it cannot be under the five-minute rule in the morning hour; and therefore, unless it specially accommodates the Senator personally, I should like to insist in my objection and let the bill lie over until we can understand something more about it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to move an amendment if the objection can be withdrawn for a moment.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly I withdraw the objection for the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I move to add to the first section these words:

For the purpose of collecting and diffusing information in regard to the condition of education in the United States.

Mr. President, I do not know that I ever heard of this bill until it came up at this moment, but it seems to me that the bill is defective in not distinctly specifying the purposes of the incorporation; and when these are specified the law will take care of the rest. A corporation undertaking to do anything ultra vires is amenable to quo warranto or other proper process, and could be restrained or its charter vacated. I suppose that it is customary to incorporate certain persons named, their associates and successors. It is always the case in such corporations, and when they are incorporated their constitution and by-laws fix the method of becoming associates and the methods of transacting business.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts, to whom I yielded, whether he understood me to direct attention to the fact that certain persons and their associates were incorporated?

Mr. HOAR. I did—associates and successors.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I was quite unfortunate in making myself understood. The feature of the bill in that behalf to which I called attention is this: that not only certain persons mentioned are incorporated, but that unnamed members and officers of another existing association and their successors are incorporated, if I read the bill aright. If the Senator from Massachusetts can lay his hand upon an instance in which we have incorporated people in that way by relation, first incorporating certain individuals and then incorporating all other individuals who might belong to some other association, and all their successors, I should like to see such an act. There may be one, but I never heard of it.

Mr. HOAR. It is hardly worth while to prolong discussion upon that point, because the difference between me and the Senator from New York is a difference in our understanding of the meaning of the language of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. That may be.

Mr. HOAR. And certainly if the bill be so drawn, as it seems to the Senator from New York, as to bear the construction that he puts upon it, it ought to be amended by making it clear. I understand this bill to mean that it incorporates certain persons, their associates and successors, persons named, and those who by the constitution and by-laws shall become members of the corporation and take in their associates; and it adds to that designation, which is the ordinary one, the description that these persons are in fact the officers and members of a certain existing association, which is an unincorporated voluntary association, as if it said "their associates and successors, persons holding real estate in the District of Columbia." But the difficulty can be easily removed by an amendment, if that is all.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not see any reason why the Senator from New York should object to the bill. It is simply doing what is done every day, for it is simply an act enabling persons to be incorporated and to have a corporate existence in the District of Columbia. It is not for business transactions, but simply for the purposes of education. As stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, these persons are made corporators by this bill in the language that is customary in bills of this character. This is the National Educational Association. The very name implies the object and purpose of the corporation, and there is no objection made to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, which only makes more certain that which might before have been perhaps misunderstood. The object of the association is to promote the interest of education simply. I understand these gentlemen to be persons who are connected with educational institutions throughout the country.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to make a suggestion to him at this point? Why not strike out the words "the officers and members of the association known as 'The National Educational Association?'" That removes the objection.

Mr. BAILEY. There can be no objection to that. The bill will be just as complete without those words as with them. I do not suppose the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRELL] would have any objection to striking them out. However, I do not feel authorized to give consent, because it is his measure. I only speak of this point because I am connected with the Committee on Education and Labor, and gave to this bill in committee, as I give it here in the Senate, and will give it when it comes to a vote unless I see some reason why my action should change, my support.

As I was proceeding to say, this bill incorporates an association of men who are connected with educational enterprises, who meet year by year for the purpose of discussing matters of common interest to them and of interest to the whole country and of getting statistics and information and publishing them to the country. It is a society which has been useful in the past, and which, I think, will be useful in the future. It desires a corporate organization, because funds are needed for the purpose of paying the expenses of the organization and providing for the printing of documents, statistics, and facts, and these publications have been of value to the country in time past, and I have no doubt will continue to be so.

It is said that twenty-five members of this association shall constitute a quorum. That can certainly not be objectionable. If Congress should choose to provide that ten members may constitute a quorum, I imagine that there could be no objection to it. It is further provided that they shall meet annually, and that Congress shall at any time have power to alter, amend, abolish, or repeal this act, leaving the corporation at the absolute mercy and under the control of Congress for all time. I can see no reason why there should be hostility to the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I must confess that I do not know what power in the Constitution gives Congress authority to pass this bill. I should like to know—

Mr. BAILEY. What power have you over the District of Columbia?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Exclusive legislation, but no right to go beyond and incorporate citizens of States. We have a right to legislate here just like the States have the power within their own jurisdiction, I admit; but the Legislature of the State of Tennessee I do not think would pretend to claim the right to incorporate a national educational society to ramify the whole Union and to hold property in any State of the Union as it may do under the second section of this bill.

It is said that the corporation may hold property to the value of $50,000; but once you concede the question of power it may be increased to fifty millions. Here are a number of gentlemen whose States are designated not citizens of the District of Columbia. This is no local charter. W. P. Haisley, of Florida, another gentleman from Kentucky, another from Tennessee, another from Ohio, and so on, ramifying the whole Union, are incorporated as citizens of those States, invested with corporate power to hold property anywhere in the Union; it is true only to the extent of $50,000.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me suggest to the Senator from Florida that this is a corporation that is to be organized and have its existence "in and of the District of Columbia," wherever the corporators may reside, and certainly the Senator from Florida will not contend that we cannot incorporate here persons who reside outside of the District.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The second section is:

That the National Educational Association shall have power to make and amend its constitution, by-laws, and rules, consistently with law, and to hold, by purchase, grant, gift, or otherwise, real or personal estate not exceeding $50,000 in value.

Where? Anywhere in the Union.

Mr. MORGAN. Cannot national banks hold property anywhere? Mr. JONES, of Florida. Where does the power come from to incorporate national banks?

Mr. MORGAN. The Supreme Court has recognized it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The power to regulate education is a very different power from the banking power. The Supreme Court of the United States has passed upon that question and has determined that the power to regulate commerce governs that, although I do not believe in the doctrine myself. Still the question of education has never been up, and while I am willing to go as far as any one in making concessions of land or anything else to the States for the purpose of education, I can never be brought to support a bill like this, which takes into the Federal authority the whole subject of regulations over education.

Mr. MORGAN. I would ask the Senator from Florida to point out in this bill any section or part of it that proposes to regulate education.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Well, Mr. President, a great many things may be done though they are not named when the power is conceded. You concede the power and you say they may adopt a constitution and by-laws under which they may do anything they please under the general powers granted. It is hard to tell what they may not do. I cannot find in the Constitution, which simply gives to the National Legislature power to govern this District, any authority to pass this bill, and I shall vote against it.

Several SENATORS addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair wishes to understand whether this bill is before the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I understand it is objected to.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand the Senator from New York to insist on his objection, and while I am anxious to have the bill passed I admit that he objected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New York please state whether he still objects. The Chair understood him to object to this bill and declared that it went over, but it has been discussed some time since.

Mr. CONKLING. I did object, Mr. President.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from New York to allow the bill to go over without prejudice—I believe that is the language used—so that amendments may be presented to-morrow morning to obviate the objections which seem to prevail.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdrew the objection at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts meaning to renew it on the conclusion of his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair then understands the bill is not before the Senate. The Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

LUCIEN KILBOURNE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 637) granting an increase of pension to Lucien Kilbourne; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant an increase of pension to Lucien Kilbourne, a private of the Eighth Regiment of Michigan Infantry Volunteers, equal to the special rate provided for the loss of an arm by amputation at or near the right shoulder.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NELSON LYON AND JEREMIAH S. JAMES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2518) for the relief of Nelson Lyon and Jeremiah S. James; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Commissioner of Patents to correct the patent dated July 9, 1872, No. 128843, and erroneously granted to Joseph Barsaloux, Jeremiah S. James, and Nelson Lyon, as joint inventors, for an invention which was in fact made by Barsaloux as sole inventor, and of which, at the time of the issue of the patent, James and Lyon were assignees of the entire and exclusive right, title, and interest. The correction is to be made upon the face of the patent, or a certified copy thereof, and by proper certificate thereof appended thereto, and when corrected the patent is to show that the grant is to James and Lyon, jointly, their heirs and assigns, as assignees of Barsaloux. The patent when corrected is to be as good and valid as if it had been originally granted and issued in the corrected form. It is to run for the term of seventeen years from and after the 9th of July, 1872, but no person is to be held liable for an infringement prior to the date of the correction.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

Mr. SAULSBURY. We have no information as to the facts of the case. The report should be read so that the facts may be spread on the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. PLATT February 16, 1880:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred an act for the relief of Nelson Lyon and Jeremiah S. James, (the same being the bill H. R. No. 2518,) having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

The object of this bill is to correct a patent, and the facts upon which the correction is asked are as follows:

In 1871, Joseph Barsaloux invented a new and useful device called a metallic stiffener for boot and shoe heels, and, before applying for a patent, assigned an undivided two-thirds of his invention to Nelson Lyon and Jeremiah S. James, and thereupon, said Barsaloux, Lyon, and James made a joint application for a patent. In such application they were all described as joint inventors, when, in fact, Bar-saloux should have been described as the sole inventor, and Lyon and James as assignees.

Upon such application the patent was issued to Barsaloux, Lyon, and James, dated July 9, 1872, No. 128843. At the date of issue Lyon and James had become the entire owners of the invention by virtue of an assignment from Barsaloux of his remaining interest made during the pendency of the application.

It is evident upon the proof in the case that the error in making the application for the patent resulted from the mistaken belief of the assignees that inasmuch as their interest had been obtained before the patent was applied for, it was proper and necessary for them to be described as joint inventors with said Barsaloux. The papers in the case were prepared by an attorney whose experience in such matters was limited.

It seems just and proper that the patent should be corrected and made valid for its unexpired term.

The committee, out of abundant caution, would recommend the following amendment: At the end of the bill add, "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall operate to invalidate the rights of any persons to whom assignments may have been made, or licenses granted under said letters-patent; but such assignments and licenses shall be as valid under said corrected letters-patent as they would have been had said letters-patent as originally granted been operative and valid," and that the bill thus amended be passed.

The Committee on Patents reported an amendment to add to the bill the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall operate to invalidate the rights of any persons to whom assignments may have been made or licenses granted under said letters; but such assignments and licenses shall be as valid under said corrected letters-patent as they would have been had said letters-patent as originally granted been operative and valid."

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know some reason for this. The original inventor made an assignment of this patent-right before the patent was granted, to these speculators. They bought it and paid for it. They were twenty-one years old and they ought to have known what they were doing. They got out a patent in their own names that they might have the benefit of it. I presume if the facts were developed and all the truth told, it would appear that their patent has been held to be invalid in the courts. The report of the committee does not disclose that fact. I presume that is the truth, however, that the courts have held that the patent granted to them gives them no exclusive right.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion to him?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate passed, without a dissenting vote on that point, a law to enable everybody as of right to have done in the Patent Office what this bill seeks to allow these persons to do, as it is a mere correction of a mistake.

Mr. COCKRELL. Passed a law to do what?

Mr. HOAR. To have such a mistake corrected in the Patent Office.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then why this bill?

Mr. HOAR. Because that proposed law has not passed the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. The law has not become a law then!

Mr. HOAR. My point, Mr. President, is that the entire Senate, without a single dissent, agreed that it was proper, as a matter of course and as a matter of right, as a universal rule, to allow these things to be done in future.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senate may have agreed to that just as it has agreed to several other things. I recollect very distinctly that the question of the retired list of the Army was frequently before the Committee on Military Affairs, and the first thing the committee knew and the first thing anybody in the Senate knew it had been increased one hundred. The committee had positively refused to act upon it. I do not believe that one Senator out of fifteen in the Senate knew when that became a law.

These parties are asking Congress to validate, to render effective, their private contract, which has doubtless proved invalid and ineffective. It is to give these men a right which they do not have to-day. That is the whole of it. They have lost their right, and this is to restore to them the exclusive right to this invention and take from the people of the country who have now the right to use it that right. It is to take it from the people at large and invest it in these patentees.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not see how it is possible that an objection can be made to the correction of this patent upon any principle. This bill is not to extend a patent; and although it is possible that there may be in some quarters prejudice against patents, I do not see how even that can be brought to bear upon the question of correcting an erroneous recital in what the Government has attempted to grant to certain individuals. It seems to me that it does not differ from the ordinary case of validating a deed which has been defectively executed by having the attestation of only one witness instead of two, or by having been acknowledged before an officer who by the statute was not authorized to take the acknowledgment of deeds.

The simple facts are these: This man Barsaloux made this invention, a very useful invention, but one that is of not very great public importance. He was entitled to a patent. He did what hundreds of other inventors do; he assigned two-thirds of his invention to parties who purchased from him before the application was made. Then, instead of making the application as the statute requires, in the name of Barsaloux alone, they all thought it was necessary for them to join. They were mistaken; they were not informed of the law.

I do not see why any punishment should be visited upon these men for that mistake, which any man is liable to make who does not employ a skilled attorney to obtain a patent.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. What punishment is Congress visiting upon them? We are simply leaving them where they left themselves. Congress is not inflicting any punishment upon them. It is simply leaving them where they placed themselves by the advice of their own counsel and their own friends, and with which the Government has nothing to do.

Mr. PLATT. The Government undertook to give them a valid patent. It undertook to protect the rights of this inventor in the hands of these assignees; and now it is said that because a little mistake was made in the formal method of making application for this patent, what the Government undertook to do should not be validated. It seems to me like a punishment, and as I said to commence with, I cannot distinguish it from the case of a man who has purchased property, but the conveyance of it is defective by reason of some statutory informality in complying with the conditions upon which the deed should be executed.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope this bill will pass. The Government by its laws says that inventors shall be secured by a patent for seventeen years in the use of their inventions. These men by a mere ignorance of law themselves, an honest mistake on their part and a mistake of their attorney, had the patent issued in the wrong name. We surely ought to correct that, and let them have the residue of their time, which is only nine years to make them seventeen in all from 1872.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from New York answer a question?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. What more right has Congress to interfere in regard to this contract between these parties than it would to interfere with a contract between a pre-emptor or homesteader on the public lands and a man to whom he had contracted to sell his right, where the courts had decided that the sale was a nullity?

Mr. KERNAN. I will answer. The Government intends to give the inventor the use of his invention for a certain time.

Mr. COCKRELL. So to the homesteader and the pre-emptor.

Mr. KERNAN. I take it that if the Government made an agreement for a consideration to give a man a patent for land, and by a mistake it was a void deed, it would correct the mistake. Here a mere mistake of an attorney, the parties being men who knew nothing about the law, caused the patent to be issued in a form that is erroneous. Now, we simply want to make it good, as equity would, for the rest of the term, to do just what the Government on the one hand and the inventor on the other intended to do when the patent was issued. I think it is simple justice to do it. The purpose is merely to reform the paper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Patents.

Mr. KERNAN. That saves everybody's rights.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask the Senator whether any persons hold a right to use the patent for this article; and whether they will have to pay a commission to manufacture this article? I could see no objection to a mere correction of an error in the obtaining a patent, unless the rights of other parties have now intervened.

Mr. KERNAN. We have not heard the slightest objection to it from anybody. It only makes the patent valid for the rest of the term, according to the original intention.

Mr. COCKRELL. If that is the object, I suggest an amendment which will cover it perfectly, that if anybody has obtained rights he shall not be interfered with. I suggest this at the end:

Provided, That—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose to amend the committee's amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. Let us first act on the committee's amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we had better amend it first. It now reads:

That nothing herein contained shall operate to invalidate the rights of any persons to whom assignments have been made or licenses granted under said letters.

Then I would add:

Or who may have been using or manufacturing the article provided for.

Mr. KERNAN. Men should not be allowed to manufacture it hereafter in violation of the patent because of a mere technical mistake like this. The bill is simply to correct an error. All persons who have used the invention are protected up to this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. They have not been protected up to this time, because you say the patent is void. Now, if men have invested their means in manufacturing these articles, and this patent is validated, those men lose what they have invested.

Mr. KERNAN. I am not aware that anybody has done so.

Mr. COCKRELL. We do know this—

Mr. KERNAN. Let me complete my answer. If a sharp fellow, getting some lawyer to find out and tell him "you can upset this patent," has gone to work using the invention, I would not protect him hereafter in doing it, he knowing that the real men ought to have their rights.

Mr. HOAR. The policy of the patent law now is wherever there is a defect in the specification the patentee goes to the Patent Office and has a reissue, and from that time forward his patent is good. That right is secured by general law. It does not make anybody a trespasser who was not a trespasser in the past. But the patent law omits by accident to provide for the correction of such a mistake as this, where a man has assigned his patent before he takes it out. Instead of its being taken out in the name of the inventor it was taken out in this case in the joint names of the inventor and assignee; and now this bill proposes to do for that mistake just what the general law does for a mistake in a specification. Nobody is a trespasser for anything he has done; nobody can say "I intended to violate this patent" that he had practical notice of, because of a mere technicality and be protected in the future.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business.

TITLES AT HOT SPRINGS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4244) for the establishment of titles in Hot Springs, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior within ten days after the passage of this act to transmit to the United States land office at Little Rock, Arkansas, the final report of the commissioners appointed under an act approved March 3, 1877, entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas," together with the survey and map made by said commissioners, and accompanying their said report, which report and map show the award of titles to lands made by the commissioners under the provisions of said act; and shall instruct the United States land officers at Little Rock to allow the lots and lands awarded to individuals or associations on the Hot Springs reservation to be entered as hereinafter provided, and shall cause patents of the usual form used in the sale of public lands to be issued therefor, except in cases hereinafter to be specified; and it shall be the duty of the land officers at Little Rock to give thirty days' notice in the Little Rock and Hot Springs newspapers of the time when said lands will be subject to entry under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That the right to have review of the decisions and adjudications in regard to claims by reason of improvements or occupancy made under sections 5 and 6 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1877, entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas," by the commissioners provided for by and appointed under that act is hereby recognized, and shall belong to as of right, and may be exercised by, any claimant or occupant of any tract or parcel of land forming part of the land specified in section 3 of the said act, whose right to purchase such tract or parcel of land, or part of the same, has been either allowed or denied by the said commissioners, where his ground of complaint shall be an adverse decision as to his right to purchase.

SEC. 3. That any person deeming himself so aggrieved may exercise his right to have the action of the commissioners reviewed by filing a petition of complaint in the Court of Claims of the United States, containing a brief statement of his claim, as presented to the commissioners, and of the opposition, if any, made thereto, and of the action and adjudication of the commissioners thereon, and alleging that such action was erroneous and in denial of his rights in refusing to him the right to purchase the tract or parcel of land claimed by him, or part of it, and shall file as an exhibit therewith the original certificate, if any, granted to him. To which petition of complaint such papers as are therein referred to may be annexed as exhibits, and the prayer thereof shall be for a writ of certiorari, to be issued to the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, requiring him to send to and certify into the said court all the papers and evidences in regard to the said claim filed in his office in obedience to section 9 of the act aforesaid, or otherwise there, concerning such claim, and for citation to all parties named therein as having adverse interests, and to the Attorney-General of the United States, and that the matter be heard de novo, as to the facts and law, by the said court.

SEC. 4. That upon the filing of such petition of complaint, the writ of certiorari and citations shall be issued, being made returnable not more than sixty days after the date thereof, and the parties cited shall answer the petition within such time thereafter as by general rule for such cases the said court shall fix; and the cause shall then be heard de novo, upon the same evidence, and no other, as to the claimant's right to purchase, and in regard to adverse claims, upon which the commissioners decided.

SEC. 5. That every such petition of complaint must be filed within sixty days from and after the passage of this act, in default whereof all right of having review of any action of the said commissioners shall be forever barred; and until the expiration of said term of sixty days no patent shall be issued upon any certificate given and granted by the said commissioners, nor, after the expiration of said term, upon any certificate of right to purchase land as to which, in whole or in part, petition of complaint may have been filed, until final adjudication on such petition, and the making known such adjudication by the court to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 6. That the adjudication and decision of the Court of Claims in every such case upon petition of complaint shall be in the last resort, final and absolute; and if in any respect the adjudication of the commissioners in any case shall be reversed, quashed, changed, altered, or modified, the court shall cause its clerk to issue to the party benefited thereby a new certificate, in lieu of that issued by the commissioners, and in the same form, upon which, if he purchase thereunder, patent shall issue to him; and the issuance of such certificate shall be a cancellation of the original; but if the adjudication of the commissioners shall in any case be at all points confirmed, upon certificate of such confirmation, given by the clerk, by order of the court, patent shall issue on the original certificate, if the party see fit to purchase thereunder.

SEC. 7. That like costs shall be allowed or taxed in cases in the Court of Claims under this act as are fixed for like services in other cases in the Court of Claims, to be taxed against one or the other party, in part or in whole, at the discretion of the said court, according to the rules that prevail in courts of equity; and persons filing petition of complaint shall at the same time file with the clerk of the court an undertaking to the United States with sureties to be approved of by said clerk, conditioned for the payment of all costs which they may in that proceeding be by the court condemned to pay, with such sureties as shall be approved as sufficient by the clerk of the court; and the court may at any time compel payment of costs by the party condemned to pay them during the progress or at the end of the suit by execution or attachment.

SEC. 8. That in cases where the commissioners have not adjudged to any person the right to purchase and enter land, and the Court of Claims shall adjudge such right, said court shall determine the amount to be paid by the claimant, taking as a basis the reduction fixed by this act.

SEC. 9. That any person, his heirs or legal representatives, in whose favor said commissioners or the said Court of Claims shall have finally adjudicated, shall have the sole right to enter and pay for the amount of land the commissioners may have adjudged him entitled to purchase, within twelve months next after the expiration of the thirty days' notice by the land officers required in section 1 to be given, in cases where no proceedings are had in the said Court of Claims, and in cases where proceedings are had in said court, within six months after the adjudication of said Court of Claims, and the issuance to such person of the certificate by the clerk of said court hereinafter provided for, by paying to the receiver of public moneys at the land office in Little Rock, Arkansas, 50 per cent. of the assessed value of said land as placed thereon by said commissioners; and that such assessments be reduced to that extent; and that in any cases where any church or church association has been adjudged entitled to purchase land it may do so by paying $5 per lot.

SEC. 10. That the certificates issued for condemned buildings by said commissioners be made receivable for the amounts named therein as so many dollars lawful money of the United States in the entry and purchase of the lands that may be sold in the Hot Springs reservation; and that such certificates be assignable, and when assigned in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, or the execution of the assignment thereof shall have been acknowledged before a court of record or clerk thereof, shall vest in the assignee the right to make such purchase and entry therewith; and in case the amount of the certificate presented and received at such land office shall exceed that necessary to make the purchase and entry desired, there shall be executed by the register and receiver, and delivered to the person from whom the same is received, a certificate giving the number of the original, the date and amount thereof, the balance due such person thereon, and the certificate thus issued shall be assignable and receivable in like manner as the original.

SEC. 11. That those divisions of the Hot Springs reservation, known as the mountainous districts, not divided by streets on the map made by the commissioners, but known and defined on the map and in the report of the commissioners as North Mountain, West Mountain, and Sugar Loaf Mountain, be, and the same are hereby, forever reserved from sale, and dedicated to public use as parks, to be known, with Hot Springs Mountain, as the permanent reservation.

SEC. 12. That whenever the town of Hot Springs shall procure elsewhere a suitable burying-ground and shall cause the bodies now buried in the cemetery lot, within the limits of said town, to be decently removed and reinterred, the title to said cemetery lot shall vest in the corporation of said town, to be held and used forever as a town or city park, and not otherwise.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to designate as many as six lots from the unawarded grounds on the Hot Springs reservation for the use of the common schools of the corporation of the town of Hot Springs, as sites for school-houses, and the lots when so designated are hereby dedicated to the use of common schools, and shall be used, controlled, and managed by the common-school officials of the district in which they may be located for such purposes only.

SEC. 14. That the streets, courts, and alleys, and other thoroughfares of the town of Hot Springs, as surveyed, opened, or established by the commissioners and represented on the map of said town, and not included in the permanent reservation, be, and the same are hereby, ceded to the corporation of the town of Hot Springs for public use.

SEC. 15. That that portion of the Hot Springs reservation laid off into lots and blocks and forming part of the town site, but not awarded to any claimants, and not otherwise disposed of or reserved by this act, shall be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, at not less than its appraised value, to be made from time to time, at the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and after public notice in the usual way in the sale of public lands; and the money arising from said sales, as well as any money paid in under section 9 of this act, shall be held as a special fund for the improvement and care of the permanent reservation at Hot Springs and of the Hot Springs Creek adjacent to and between the permanent reservations, and for the maintenance of free baths for the invalid poor of the United States, as provided by acts of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. WALKER on the 27th of February, 1880:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 4244) for the establishment of titles in Hot Springs and for other purposes, and also the letter of the Secretary of the Interior transmitting the report of the Hot Springs commissioners, submit the following report:

The committee have been anxious, in arriving at a conclusion in this matter, to reach, as far as could be, a result that would be final. The litigation about the Hot Springs has been long, tedious, vexatious, and costly. Above all things it seemed to the committee important to end this completely, if possible. But few complaints have been made to the findings of the commissioners under the act of March 3, 1877, as to the possessory right to lots; and the committee have thought it proper to give in these cases a review of the findings in some way that would not interfere at all with the disposal of the other lots. To this end they have provided for a certiorari in the Court of Claims to the Interior Department to bring up the records and papers of the commissioners there deposited for examination; and if, upon review, any of these findings are erroneous they are to be quashed; if not erroneous they are to be affirmed. The commissioners are out of office, and no appeal proper could well be provided for, if it were desirable to do so. The method adopted by the committee is plain, direct, inexpensive, and affords a remedy to those who may be aggrieved by any findings by the commissioners as to the right of possession under the act referred to.

Many complaints have been made as to the assessments fixed upon property by the commissioners. Of course the committee could not examine each case and determine as to this matter. But they have examined it in general; and while they find the commissioners valued property at its market value and price, and they could adopt no other rule, yet, in the peculiar condition of the property there, it has been deemed advisable to recommend a reduction of these assessments in gross. It is perfectly plain the Government never intended to make money out of the occupants on that land; in many cases it is the only estate of the occupants; they have held it under adverse circumstances for years, and their profits have been for the last few years only nominal. The gross assessments, $223,000, taken from that place would well-nigh prostrate its business, and would in many cases break the occupants. The Government has been at some expense to inaugurate and carry out a plan to dispose justly of that property, and this expense should very properly be paid by the property itself, and beyond reimbursing the Government for its outlays in this behalf the committee think these assessments should not go. A reduction of 50 per cent. (one-half) upon the whole amount assessed will pay all these expenses and leave a surplus. And this reduction the committee think is fair and just, and have so provided in the bill.

The certificates issued by the commissioners for condemned property under the act of March 3, 1877, are of course to be paid at some time by the Government, and it is would require an appropriation and outlay of money. To avoid this, and to simplify the transaction, the committee think it better to take up these certificates as far as can be done in the payment of lots set apart to persons on preference right under that act, and they have so arranged it in the bill presented. In effect it is just the same to the Government, and it is more direct and expeditious, in that it does not require payment in money from the owner, and then waiting by him for the Government to take up his certificate with money.

With many conflicting interests at the Hot Springs, and almost as many different views urged and asserted before the committee, they have agreed on this plan, after long and anxious consideration, having before them all the time the equities of the people claiming property there under the act of March 3, 1877, and the rights of the Government as well. With a wish to do justice between all, and end this matter without further trouble and delay, the committee report this bill, believing its passage will secure the desired object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear this matter explained a little. I do not see quite as clearly as the committee seem to do the fitness of this legislation.

In 1877 Congress passed an act which, just as the committee speak of this one, was designed to make a finality of the Hot Springs business. By the terms of that act it was made a finality, and Congress had nothing left to do about it as far as I remember that act of 1877. The title to this property had been decided to be in the United States after all sorts of cross litigation between various claimants and so on. Congress, therefore, was called upon to make provision for disposing of this property and attending to such equitable rights as might appear;—equitable I mean in the sense of morals, for I suppose there were no legally equitable rights. Accordingly the act of 1877 was passed which provided that the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate should appoint three commissioners who, between the respective squatters on this property should decide conflicting claims and ascertain which among them (where there was any conflict) was the person who was best entitled to be allowed to purchase the land on which he had settled or occupied, at its value, that being ascertained, the law provided that such occupant might purchase it at its value and might have a certificate, or allowance in some form that I need not go into now, in respect of his improvements; that that commission should proceed to hear, try, and determine all these matters, report to the Secretary of the Interior, and that should be the end of it. That has been done.

The law having entirely exerted itself and performed its functions through these commissioners, it is proposed afterward to have a new trial for everybody that chooses to seek a new trial, and a review of the action of these commissioners by the Court of Claims on the theory that that will satisfy everybody, and then it will be final. Why should it be any more final than it is now? It is not stated in the report of the Committee on Public Lands that there is any just ground for believing that there has been any fraud or corrupt misconduct on the part of these commissioners or any of them. Nothing of the kind is hinted at. On the contrary the report states that the commissioners have made on the whole a very just and fair estimate of values and have decided on the whole (without going into particular cases) rightly. In some cases there are complaints. That undoubtedly is true. There probably never have been many instances in human affairs where when a tribunal has been constituted to decide on conflicting interests, one side or the other after the decision did not complain that it was erroneous. Now the committee say that in this case the complaints are few.

Is it right as a matter of principle—I am not now speaking of the details of this bill—is it right as a matter of principle for the Congress of the United States, in disposing of this property of its own, having once made a final provision for deciding everything that Congress thought it fit to have decided about it, and that decision having been made; is it right, I ask, on the complaint of anybody to reopen the thing, to provide for further trials in favor of dissatisfied claimants, and particularly when those claimants are not resting upon the ground of an absolute right, but are only resting upon the generosity of the Government which was exerted in the passage of the act of 1877, giving them the privilege of purchasing the land at its value, to the exclusion of others. That is the thing that puzzles me, I confess, and with great respect to the committee I speak of it in order that we may see the grounds and views upon which the committee go.

Then it is proposed in the next place that, instead of the United States Treasury being paid the value of this property of the United States by the people who wish to purchase it, the Treasury shall only be paid half the value, and that the tax-payers of the United States shall therefore part with just that much money or value for the benefit of particular settlers who have without any authority of law occupied these lands, and for the benefit of settlers who so far as they have made improvements have already been provided for. Of course I know how hopeless a thing it is to seek to protect the Treasury of the United States or the property of the people against a demand in favor of anybody who has got possession and is in the occupancy of any part of the public lands of the United States, or I might add perhaps any other part of its property. At the same time it is fit to call the attention of the Senate to it and to hear from the committee upon what ground it is of public justice, upon what ground it is of public propriety that the people of the United States who own this land shall be called upon to give half of its value to the people who have chosen to occupy it, and now wish to purchase it. That is the question. They are not obliged to purchase it.

Then, Mr. President, there are other matters about this bill that I should like to make some inquiry in regard to as it goes on. I notice one very peculiar phrase, that "as many as six lots," leaving no upward limit, are to be given away entirely to some purpose, I have forgotten what it is,—a very singular expression. There is no limit in that phrase, of course; the whole number may be given away that are unappropriated to the private people who wish to buy. All those lots that are unassigned to any claimant may be given away in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior or Commissioner of the General Land Office or somebody. I do not wish to give away the property of the people in exactly that way; that is to say I do not wish to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to do it for me or for my constituents.

There are a good many other things that may be explained as we go on, which are somewhat singular about this bill; but the chief thing that I shall be glad to have the honorable Senator from Arkansas, who I believe has charge of the bill, explain, is just now, first the principle upon which it is necessary that Congress, having in 1877 made a finality of this business and that finality having turned out, like the judgment of the Supreme Court or any other court, to be on the whole commendable, should now open it to further litigation, subject to anybody's claims, and particularly as those claims are not claims of right to property but are merely conflicting claims between people who have occupied this property without the authority of law. And then secondly upon what just principle it is that one-half of the value of this property is to be given to the persons who have occupied it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President, this is a question in which my colleague and myself, the Senators from Arkansas, do not think we have a greater interest than those representing other States. We wish to discharge our duty, and our duty alone. The facts and the law of the case are familiar to the Senate. The commissioners, as has been stated, have discharged their duty under the law. We do not make any attack on those commissioners or their action. Certain duties were assigned them, and I think they have faithfully performed the duties assigned to them.

I shall not go into the history of this Hot Springs litigation. There was a contest, as is known to the Senate, between various claimants for years, and it was finally decided by the Supreme Court of the United States against all of them, that none of the parties claiming these lands were entitled to any legal right in the lands in controversy; that the United States Government never had parted with its title. But right here permit me to say that when we look back to the decision made by the Supreme Court, it clearly appears that a strong right, an equitable right, or at least a moral right, existed in the case of certainly one of the claimants. When we look at that decision what do we find? That the reason why the Supreme Court did not decide in favor of the litigant to whom I have referred was not on account of any fault of himself or his ancestor or predecessor, but for the reason that a fault—I may term it so—was committed by an officer of the Government. The grant made to Rector and Hammond was made in accordance with law, but the officer of the Government failed to file the survey in the recorder's office, as required by law, and upon that ground the Supreme Court say the claimant was not entitled to the land. I will read for one moment from the decision as found in the Court of Claims Reports, volume 11, page 321:

But the claimant insists that this was not the fault of Hammond and Rector; that they did all they could do; and that the surveyor-general could not by neglecting his duty, namely, that of recording the survey and returning it to the recorder of land titles, deprive them of their just rights. But when the survey was made, the act of 1832 was not in existence; the laws then were, as the Attorney-General held them to be, that unsurveyed lands were not lands the sale of which were authorized by law; and as this doctrine was received and acted upon by the Land Department of the Government, we should not feel authorized at this late day to reverse it. And it is not shown that any further efforts were made to have the location perfected until after the passage of the act of 1832. If at any subsequent time it became the duty of the surveyor-general to return the survey to the recorder's office, no application for that purpose seems to have been made. A clear duty on his part could have been enforced by mandamus had he refused to perform it.

The whole burden of this decision is simply that the survey not having been filed in the office of the recorder of land titles the claim of Rector and Hammond failed. Here again:

In conclusion we feel bound—

It seems to be with reluctance—

In conclusion we feel bound to decide that none of the claimants are entitled to the lands in question. The claims advanced all depend on one or other of the titles which we have considered, and all are equally untenable. Whatever hardship, if any, may ensue from this declaration of the law of the case we have no doubt will be duly taken into consideration by the legislative department of the Government in dealing with the subject of the future disposition of those lands.

From this decision it would appear that had the plat of the survey been filed in the proper office of the Government, the title to these Hot Springs, hot water and all, would have vested in the original claimant of the property. I refer to this decision to show that there appears to be a good basis for the application here made for the reduction that is allowed by this bill.

And while on this point permit me to say that it is not the object of this bill nor of those who advocate it to leave the Government unremunerated. This bill of our committee goes upon a basis that the Government shall be repaid all the expenses it has been to in this business; even the seventy-two thousand and odd dollars expended for the commissioners is to be repaid. Seventy-two thousand and odd dollars is the amount, as I learn from the letter of the Interior Department, expended by the commissioners. It is the intention of this bill that that amount shall be paid back. It is the intention of this bill that the Government shall not suffer.

The assessment made upon individuals there who proved their right to purchase the property as adjudged amounts to $223,000. We propose to require payment of half of that, $111,500. The fact should be borne in mind that at the time when these people were least able to bear it, in 1876, a receiver was sent by the Court of Claims to take charge of the property and receive the rents. After deducting the expenses of that receivership we find that thirty-five thousand and odd dollars has been received by the Government and its agents. In addition to that condemned property has been sold amounting to $1,800 or more. When you make these deductions and make a calculation of the certificates for condemned property, which certificates we propose to make legal tender for any of these lands, there is still a surplus to come to the Government from the sale of the lands notwithstanding the Government gets the hot-water reservation and the better portion of the tract. The receipts under this bill, with the other items I have named, will pay all expenses and still leave an amount coming to the Government.

It must be perpetually borne in mind that many of these parties purchased from one supposed to be the owner, and paid for the property which they now have to buy again from the Government. They believed that those from whom they bought had a legal right to the property, though it was in litigation. They acted upon that supposition and invested their money upon the presumption that they would receive a title from the owners who were contending; but the decision of the Supreme Court was against the parties contending for the property; and now they come and say: "We have been put to hardship; we have been put to trouble; we have paid for this property once; we ask a beneficent Government to make a reduction and say that one-half of those assessments shall be enough. We have paid once; we hope the Government will not ask us to pay again in full."

Upon the question of certiorari I have only a few words to say at this time. There are but a few parties who are dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioners. I do not look upon their action as being a finality. I do not see that these parties are prohibited by the act of 1877 from applying for further legislation. There is nothing that I can see in the act that tends in that direction. A few persons are dissatisfied, and only a few. The bill that came over from the House of Representatives made provision for an appeal to the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas; but your Committee on Public Lands thought that would tend too much to increase litigation, and therefore have proposed the plain, simple remedy of a writ of certiorari to be issued to the Secretary of the Interior where all the evidences in regard to the controversy are on file, and then all the papers connected with the particular claims for which a certiorari is sued out are to be sent to the Court of Claims and there the matter is to be heard and decided. There are but few of these cases. If parties have been injured is it not proper that the Court of Claims should have an opportunity to review the action of the commissioners and do justice to these parties?

I must confess, however, that as to this question of certiorari I have but little care. I think it much more important for the interest of these people who want to get a title to these lands, that there should be a reduction of the assessment and that the certificates for condemned property should be made legal tender for the purpose of paying for the lands; and beyond that the bill does not extend in that respect, it simply providing that these certificates shall be received in payment for the lands in the Hot Springs reservation.

There is a section authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to select six lots for public-school sites. It seems to me the Government under the circumstances can well afford to make this donation of lands for school purposes, and I can see no serious objection to it.

There are other gentlemen who are fully prepared to address the Senate on the subject. This is as much as I desire to say at present.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, as this bill has come—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Senator from Indiana proceeds, may I, with his permission, inquire whether we have the report of the commission, or a copy of it with a map or diagram which shows the number of lots, and how they lie, and so on?

Mr. GARLAND. On page 3 of the report of the commissioners (Senate Executive Document No. 21, Forty-sixth Congress, second session) the information is given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a map also in the possession of the Senate?

Mr. GARLAND. There is a map at the office of the Interior Department, and one at my room, but I do not think there is one here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I inquire at the same time—because the Senator from Indiana in the course of his remarks can probably explain that also—what proportion of those who are authorized to purchase fall within the category described by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] as being people who bought the lands from the persons who were the original claimants under the expectation that they had a legal title. He said there were a good many of each as I understood.

Mr. McDONALD. All of these parties, inasmuch as the act by which the commissioners made these assessments required them to take into consideration no claim of purchasers since the decision of the Supreme Court. It was only those purchasers who had purchased and were in possession at the time the Supreme Court decided that the property belonged to the United States, whose possessory rights were considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Those were purchasers under both the conflicting titles, were they not?

Mr. McDONALD. Under some prior title or claim of title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There would be one purchaser under one prior title, and another under another.

Mr. McDONALD. Yes; under some prior claim of title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which stood in conflict.

Mr. McDONALD. Yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I should like to ask one thing more, and then I will not interrupt my honorable friend further, and that is, what are these certificates that are spoken of that the bill provides shall be treated as money?

Mr. McDONALD. I will explain that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the rights which under existing law these certificates now confer?

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, the report of the Senate Committee on Public Lands is made upon House bill No. 4244, and the committee reports a substitute for that bill. The Committee on Public Lands were not able to consider this matter in the light presented by the House bill, and while we were as anxious as the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator that there should be a final ending of this Hot Springs controversy and Hot Springs legislation, we were compelled to take up and consider the question because it had been sent to us by the Senate, the House having already acted as far as it was concerned upon the same matter.

The points that have been suggested by the Senator from Vermont relate, first, to the provision in the substitute reported by the Committee on Public Lands which provides for a review in the Court of Claims of the assessments made by the board of commissioners upon the same records and facts as those that were considered by the board of commissioners—a certiorari from the Court of Claims.

I do not suppose that any one hoped when the Hot Springs commission was organized that the three gentlemen, able and careful as they might be, would be able to take up all the controversies that were submitted to them under that law and so completely solve every one of them that there would be no dissatisfaction or even no injustice. So there were claims and complaints preferred to the Committee on Public Lands in regard to them; and while these were not many, and perhaps not very aggravated, yet they seemed to be of sufficient importance in the view of the committee to induce it to provide in some mode for a review of the decision of the board; and in providing a mode for some we saw no particular reason why we should limit it to any particular class. The right of review should of necessity be open to all who might see proper to seek that remedy, or no right whatever should be provided, because it was impossible for us to select and single out those who had made their complaints to us and close the door to those who had not come forward, on the assumption that they had no complaints to make.

The House bill that we were considering had authorized this kind of a review by a proceeding to be instituted in the district court of the United States for the district in which these lands are situated, which would have been a trial de novo, an entirely new proceeding, and would necessarily have had to drag its slow length along through the inferior court up to the superior court, and to the Supreme Court of the United States in any case where the amount involved was sufficient to finally vest that court with jurisdiction. It would have opened up again the whole question of inquiry as to testimony and everything of that sort. The Committee on Public Lands did not think best to recommend that proceeding, did not concur with the House bill upon that subject, and instead of that the provision that is incorporated in the substitute for a certiorari was introduced, and it embraces just that scope and no more, that those who feel aggrieved by the decision and judgment of the board of commissioners in regard to the assessment made of the value or of controverted questions of possessory right may have a review to that extent by taking their proceedings in the manner herein provided.

Then we came to the consideration of perhaps the most important question involved in this case, and that was as to how those parties should be treated who were in possession under titles that were claimed at the time of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States by which the title was declared to be in the United States. The Supreme Court, in the decision that has been referred to, very clearly regarded them as standing in the light of occupying claimants, occupying claimants possessing strong equities, and while the Supreme Court could not award to them the legal title under the facts presented in the case, it did not pass the case from it without having very clearly indicated that they were not there entirely in the wrong as tort-feasors or wrong-doers, but that they were there as parties who believed they had rights, and that those rights when the legislative branch of the Government came to deal with this question would be considered and regarded.

In the act providing for this board of assessment, the Hot Springs commission, the commissioners were required to receive the application of all those who claimed possessory rights, and to award as they should find those facts to be. They were also required to make assessment of the value of the lands in the possession of those parties. The act provided that those persons who were thus in possession might become the privileged purchasers, and it was certainly in contemplation perhaps that no further legislation would be required. The board have made their assessment. They have filed their report with the Secretary of the Interior, designating such lots and parts of lots as they have found to have been in the possession of the various claimants and the extent of those possessory rights, and they have also made the assessment, under the law as they regarded it, of the value of the property thus in the possession of those parties. The aggregate value, as they find, of that property now is $223,000. This property covers 699.80 acres, a little less than 700 acres. The whole quantity of land that has been laid off in lots on the entire reservation covers 1,270 acres, so that there is almost one-half of the town plat of the town of Hot Springs that is not embraced within these claims. That is property which the United States has an unqualified right and claim to, both as to the title and as to the possession and as to everything that pertains to it.

The occupants upon the 699.80 acres that the commissioners have found have these possessory rights come forward and say that it is not right that the Government should exact from them the full measure of value of this property at its present cash price, valued on an average at something over $300 per acre; that this value has been greatly given to it by their labor, by their settling upon it; that they went there not as trespassers, but as parties believing that they owned the property, having purchased from those who they understood were the true and lawful owners; that it is by their act as much as anything else that this property has been enhanced and made valuable as it now is, and they therefore ask of Congress that, in the spirit of the decision of the Supreme Court that had divested them of their title, there should be some reasonable deduction made from the present value of the property, and that some concessions be made to them on account of their labors and the improvements that they had put upon it by which the value of the property has been enhanced.

The House of Representatives in the bill before us had considered that same question and they had treated it in accordance with the usage of the Government in regard to what is known as town sites upon public lands, and therefore in their bill they had required these parties to pay a nominal sum. The second section of the House bill provided on that subject that these persons should be entitled—to purchase, at any time within twelve months next after the expiration of the thirty days' notice by the land officers required in the preceding section to be given, by paying on every separate certificate of award covering a lot of one acre, or of any fraction of an acre, the sum of $10; and on every separate certificate covering more than one acre but not over two acres, the sum of $20; and on every separate certificate covering more than two acres but not over three acres, the sum of $30; and so on at this rate, paying an additional $10 on every additional acre or fraction of an acre covered by any certificate.

So that the bill which came to us from the House, treating this subject in analogy to the usages of the Government in regard to town sites located upon public lands that had not yet been surveyed, put the price down to $10 an acre or thereabout. The valuation ascertained by the board of assessment was over $300 an acre. So it will be seen that the House taking the view it did of this subject put it down to a nominal sum.

When the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate came to consider that question it thought it was but fair and right that as between the United States and these occupying claimants the present value of the land should be fairly divided, and therefore we report a provision to reduce the assessments—not undertaking to rate it per acre, but to reduce the assessments at the rate of 50 per cent., thus giving to the occupying claimants the benefit of the enhanced value of this property to the extent of 50 per cent. of its present value, and reserving to the United States the other 50 per cent. for its proprietary right. That gives to the United States on these seven hundred acres—for I shall treat it as in round numbers, that many hundred—a value of about $159 per acre. Then it leaves the remainder of the property that has been thus laid off into town lots, and that is not within the permanent reservations to be hereafter sold at its present value, because all who have a right to claim any abatement in price on account of their labor and on account of having contributed to this enhanced value of the property have been provided for, and those who purchase hereafter will pay what the land is worth according to its appraisement.

That is the principle of the report of the Committee on Public Lands. The law that this bill supplements vested in the board of commissioners the power to go on and correct the town plat of the town of Hot Springs, to lay off additional streets, and to widen those already laid off, and to make certain changes and improvements upon the location and plat of the town. It also dedicated a certain portion of this reservation of four sections—for that is the whole amount of the reservation—to the public. It is known as the permanent reservation, embracing the Hot Springs proper and certain rights and privileges connected with those Springs. There were upon this permanent reservation improvements that had been put there by parties who have settled at Hot Springs and made improvements there. The principal hotel at the town of Hot Springs, the Arlington, was located, as it turned out afterward, upon this permanent dedication—this permanent reservation.

Again, in straightening the streets, in laying out the avenues, in improving the town, it became necessary to condemn and remove improvements that had been put there, buildings that were found to be within the street limits when the streets came to be thus changed and improved, so that the commissioners, the Government having by the act of 1877 in effect condemned these improvements, were directed to ascertain their value, because the Government could not take this private property for public use or condemn it or order it to be removed or destroyed for public considerations without paying the owners, and the land certificates that are spoken of here are the certificates issued by the commissioners to the owners of those improvements for the value of those improvements, thus condemned by the Government, for improvements that were found to be in the streets when the streets came to be straightened, or in the avenues when the avenues came to be opened. The Government claimed as a matter of course the proprietary right to all this property, and claimed therefore the right to make these streets and avenues where it pleased. Further, some portions of the improvements were found to be on the permanent reservation that the Government had reserved permanently for the public use, and the act that these commissioners were executing directed them to ascertain what those improvements were worth that were thus removed or destroyed or taken out of the way, or condemned on the permanent reservation, and to issue to the owners thereof a certificate for their value.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the Senator mean by a certificate for their value? Is it anything more than a paper which states that the value of the building, or the fence, or whatever it is that is to be moved off or destroyed is so much?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir; it is a recognition that A, to whom that certificate issues, was the owner of that building, that he had placed it there with his own money, and that it becoming necessary in the plan the Government had in regard to this property that it should be condemned, he should have this certificate for its value.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand the Senator yet, whether he means to say that the act of 1877 makes the certificate an obligation of the Government of the United States or anybody else to do anything, or whether it is merely the statement of a fact that a squatter on property that did not belong to him had constructed a building or a fence or something that the proprietor found it necessary to tear down.

Mr. McDONALD. The difference between the Senator and myself is that he calls these people squatters on property that did not belong to them; in my country occupying claimants who go upon property that they honestly believe they have a title to are regarded as the owners of their improvements. They are not termed squatters. The law recognizes that having gone there under a claim of title and made improvements, the improvements belong to them, and the ultimate owner of the fee cannot undertake to dispossess them of that property, although his title may be never so good, until he has made provision for the payment of these improvements.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What law is it the Senator is speaking of—the law of the United States or of Indiana?

Mr. McDONALD. The law of any honest people anywhere.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it is merely a moral law that we are speaking of.

Mr. McDONALD. I say this is property, recognized as property by law. I know of no State in which it is not so recognized. Does the Senator? I ask the Senator from Vermont if he knows of any State in which an occupying claimant of property under a color of title is not regarded as the owner of improvements that he puts upon it before the title has been pronounced against him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know of any State where the law is as the Senator now states it in that phrase. I do know of some States where the law is that if a possessor being expelled in an action of ejectment can show that he purchased the land for value believing that he had got a good title and had made improvements or betterments upon it, as they are called, the jury in assessing the damages for the ejectment may make a reasonable and equitable allowance to him so that justice will be done between the two parties.

In this case, what have we? Take the instance of some one who did purchase on what he supposed to be a good title—which I do not understand by any means to be everybody embraced in this bill, far from it; but there may be some; what is the provision? The bill provides, first, that a man who thus purchased under a mistake, believing he had a good title, shall have the land itself at half the value; second, that he shall be paid the full assessed value, instead of half, of the improvements that he has put upon it.

Mr. McDONALD. No, the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think not. And that the Senator regards as dealing with the property of the people of the United States in the way that it is our business to do.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator is entirely mistaken. It is not often that he is mistaken, of course; but he is entirely mistaken now. These certificates do not issue to any man who retains the right to purchase the land on which the improvements were made. They only issue in favor of those who had made improvements before the decision of the Supreme Court had been rendered deciding that the Government owned the land, and those improvements were afterward found to be in the highway as laid out by these commissioners or on that part of the premises that is permanently retained from sale. As to the 699.80 acres that are found to have been in possession of other parties under circumstances which gave them certain possessory rights, there is not one single dollar of certificates issued for any improvement thereon, but the certificates are issued to those who had made improvements before, not those who have made them since, because all the improvements that have been made since the decision of the Supreme Court have been regarded just in the light that the Senator wants all these improvements regarded. He admits himself that where a party has purchased in good faith believing he had a title, his improvements are protected even in his State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say that, Mr. President.

Mr. McDONALD. You did not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir. If the Senator is to quote me on a matter of law, I wish he would quote me exactly as I stated it. I say that in the State of Vermont and in a good many other States there is a provision that when a person has a recovery against him in an action of ejectment and he can show to the court that he purchased under a color of title and believing he had a good title, the extent that he has improved the land so that it is so much better for the owner than it was before shall be taken into the account in doing justice between them. That is a singular rule to apply to a case where these people now on these lands at the Hot Springs, and to justify a provision that to all of those who were not in the streets the land is to be given for half its value, the improvements being already theirs, on the Senator's theory, or to be allowed for in the same way as those that are in the streets. And so you are to pay what he calls the owner of the building—but he is not; he is only a person who has an equity for an allowance—you are to pay the man who has that property as it is called which is to be moved off or which in a good many of these cases the man himself moved right back on his lot and took his certificate as it is called, which is now to be turned into money. He moves his building back on to his lot; he has got his building, and his certificate, and his land, all three when this bill passes; and that the Senator says is the spirit of the betterment act!

Mr. McDONALD. Though he has employed a good deal of circumlocution, I do not see that the Senator has made it any plainer that the purchaser in good faith from one having color of title, or a person in possession of property in good faith under color of title, is to be protected in the improvements that he has made upon that property until the question of title is determined against him.

I am perfectly willing that the Senator's statement and mine shall both be made, and if there is any difference between them in principle—there is a good deal of difference in language—I cannot understand it.

Now, Mr. President, the act under which these assessments were made expressly provided that the commissioners should not assess any improvements that were made after the decision of the Supreme Court. It was simply the improvements that were made before the Supreme Court had determined this property to belong to the United States, and the valuation was made of just the kind of property I have already stated; that is, improvements that were found to be in the streets or avenues as the commissioners finally laid off the town off Hot Springs, or that were upon the permanent reservation that the Government retained permanently to itself. That is just what they were, and nothing else. We supposed that it was certainly in contemplation that all such claims as were for property actually condemned by the United States, property that had been put there by the parties in good faith and before they had any reason to suppose that the title they were improving under was not a good one, would be paid. The act under which these assessments were made did not make any particular provision for this payment. It did, however, direct the issuance of the evidence of that debt or claim.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to read the statute?

Mr. McDONALD. I have not got it before me, but it shall be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see exactly what it does say.

Mr. McDONALD. The statute authorizing these assessments can be readily referred to. The simple question, therefore, is whether in closing up this matter of the Hot Springs the Government will receive its own certificates as a part of the purchase price of property that these parties may purchase there; whether the amount which these commissioners, in the name of the Government, have said was the value of the property condemned on account of its being either in the streets, alleys, and avenues, or on the permanent reservation shall be received in making payment for that portion of the town of Hot Springs that it proposes to dispose of, either from the occupying claimants in payment of whatever they shall be required to pay, or from the purchase or entry by any other parties who may see proper to buy any lots outside of these claims.

But another objection has been suggested to this as being rather too free a use of the public property, and that is in the thirteenth section:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to designate as many as six lots—

Of course under this act he cannot designate any more than six. He may designate as many as six. I do not know whether it would be more definite if it was amended by saying "not to exceed six." I do not see any particular ambiguity in it as it stands now, and no latitude certainly beyond the six lots.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would not twenty be "as many as six?"

Mr. McDONALD. I should think they would, but I would ask the Senator if he was designating these lots with authority to designate "as many as six," if he would designate any more than six?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would depend in my judgment, if it was committed to me, upon what the public interest and generosity and so forth required. It would be a perfectly clear authority in point of law to give as many as I liked, not less than six.

Mr. McDONALD. My opinion is that in following the construction the Senator is inclined to give to this act, he would not give more than one lot.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should feel obliged to give at least six, because the law commands that.

Mr. McDONALD. No, you may give that many, but that does not oblige you to give the whole six. If it would make it any more specific in the estimation of the Senator to say "not exceeding six," it is very easy to insert that amendment. But what are these lots to be given for?

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to designate as many as six lots from the unawarded grounds on the Hot Springs reservation for the use of the common schools of the corporation of the town of Hot Springs, as sites for school-houses, and the lots when so designated are hereby dedicated to the use of common schools, and shall be used, controlled, and managed by the common-school officials of the district in which they may be located for such purposes only.

As many as six lots for school sites. I understand this to mean not more than six. As many as six lots are to be designated in the town of Hot Springs; that is a town now which covers some twelve hundred acres of land. A little more than half of it is in the possession of these occupying claimants. The remainder the United States holds in absolute fee, has an entire right to. Whatever there is upon it of improvement or anything else belongs to the United States.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to set apart certain lots which he may designate as sites for school-houses, not exceeding six. Six sites are to be set apart for school-houses in the town of Hot Springs. There is no private man in the United States engaged in managing his own affairs who in laying off a town of that size would not designate more lots than six for school purposes and think he was doing himself a benefit; yet it is carped at because it is proposed to authorize six sites for common schools in this town which covers twelve hundred and odd acres of ground.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very much obliged to my friend for saying it is carped at. That may be his way of looking at it, but I hope I shall not be disturbed at that measure of epithet. The Senator will pardon me if I ask, which I rose to do, how many sections of land are embraced in this Hot Springs reservation that were decided to belong to the United States, altogether?

Mr. McDONALD. Four sections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In a township I believe, there are thirty-six sections generally, are there not?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Always.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought I would put it "generally," because it might be thought "carping" if I said "always." The State of Arkansas, when she came into the Union, had the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township granted to her for the use of schools, I presume.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. She had the sixteenth anyhow.

Mr. McDONALD. She had the sixteenth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not the thirty-sixth?

Mr. McDONALD. Not the thirty-sixth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But by some subsequent act?

Mr. McDONALD. No.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No matter; call it the sixteenth.

Mr. McDONALD. In the newer Western States the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections have been granted. That was not done at the time Arkansas was admitted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think you will find that, and at rather a remote period, Arkansas has had liberal provision made; so that I hope the Senator will not think that it is a very small business on my part, in trying to protect the property of the people of the United States, or at least have it discussed, if I inquire a little how it happens that this sort of provision is to be made in disposing of four sections of land that have been decided after great expense to the Government to belong to the people. It is true it is a small business, but when the business of chaffing the Treasury comes to be divided into small ranges, it is necessary if you are going to resist at all that you shall resist in the same proportion. I do not say that this is part of that business; it is not designed as such I know; the Senator will give me leave to say that; but I must be allowed to suggest to him that he ought not really to consider that a reasonable inspection of the effect upon the people whose labor pays for everything of this kind is an improper method of dealing with the subject. I submit it to his consideration whether it is.

Mr. McDONALD. I have nothing to say to that. I do not think that the quantity of lands reserved in the State of Arkansas at the time of her admission into the Union for common schools or public schools has anything to do with this question at all. It was certainly not in contemplation when those reservations were made that the Government should reserve out perpetually from sale any part of these four sections. The four sections of land involved in this inquiry and to be settled and disposed of by us here have accidentally come into this condition not from any design on the part of the Government, for these lands could have been entered; there is no doubt about that; they could have been purchased—

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. At any time.

Mr. McDONALD. There was no reservation made. An accidental omission of a Government officer in reference to filing and recording the survey and location defeated these parties of their title.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It defeated Rector's entry.

Mr. McDONALD. He was the principal claimant.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. He was the sole claimant, really.

Mr. McDONALD. It defeated his title; and years after we come to consider what we shall do with this property upon which this valuable medicinal spring is found. The sole center of attraction in all this thing is the fact that the spring is there. We should be in a very small business indeed if we were engaged in legislating on the subject of that mountain gorge if it was not for the spring that has been developed not by the United States but by the people who have congregated there for the purpose of enjoying the benefits of its waters and who have settled there and developed it. If it was not for that we should have nothing of this here at all.

The United States has come to be the proprietor, for that is just its condition at present, of these four sections, on which these remarkable springs are found, where the people have entered into the mountain gorges there and settled as best they could, have built up a little town and are struggling along to maintain themselves. When the Government as the proprietor of these four sections comes to make some disposition of them, I do not think there is any wasteful extravagance on our part, representing the Government, in making some reasonable and suitable provision for school sites in that town, independent of the thirty-sixth section, or the sixteenth, or any other section that may have been granted to the State generally. In that town, in that locality, I do not think it is very wasteful extravagance to make suitable provision for designating school-house sites out of these four sections of land.

If there is any difficulty about the provision of this bill being ambiguous as to the number, it is very easy to correct that. I know of no one who is more apt in using language for that purpose than my distinguished friend from Vermont, and he is always ready to do it, too. So it did seem to me, when he was commenting upon this provision as if it was leaving some wonderfully latitudinous discretion to the Secretary of the Interior, by which he might absorb almost the whole of this reservation in school-house sites or under pretense of school-house sites, that he certainly understood what the committee meant clearly and distinctly; and if our meaning has not been couched in terms that could have prevented any quibble over it, it is easy to correct it. Therefore, when I said "carped at," I, of course, meant no personal disrespect to the Senator at all, but it did seem to me that in place of making the criticism he did upon the terms of the bill it would have been more in the line of his course here as a legislator to have suggested an amendment to the section referred to.

Mr. President, I have said all on this subject that I desire to say. I do not think that the Government will be a loser on any principles of equity and justice if this bill shall become a law. These people who have settled there and have established their possessory rights are required to pay about $150 an acre for land that the Government a long time ago would have parted with for a dollar and a quarter an acre; and it would be very willing to part with it for a dollar and a quarter an acre to-day if it was not for the hot springs and the improvements and the enhanced value that has been given to that property by its public development, in which the Government has taken no part except to assert its claim and gather in the control of the property. Now, having that control, it seems to me that it would more comport with the dignity of the Government to act with reasonable generosity toward those people than to insist that they shall pay for all the enhanced value of the land to which they themselves have contributed so much.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the statute of 1877 read, if anybody can find it.

Mr. GARLAND. Here is the statute. I will hand it to the Senator. Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator in charge of the bill could no doubt have read in a moment the provision about the certificates and what they amount to; though I think I have found it in the ninth section:

That it shall be the duty of said commissioners, without delay, to file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior the map and survey herein provided for, with the boundary-lines of each claim clearly marked thereon, and with each division and subdivision traced and numbered, accompanied by a schedule, showing the name of each claimant, and of each lot or parcel of land, the appraised value thereof, numbers to correspond with such claim upon the map; also all of the evidence taken by them respecting the claimants' possessory right of occupation to any portion of the Hot Springs reservation and their findings in each case; also their appraisal of each tract or parcel of land, and the improvements thereon; and it shall be the duty of said commissioners to issue a certificate to each claimant, setting forth the amount of land the holder is entitled to purchase, and the valuation fixed thereon, and also showing the character and the valuation fixed upon the improvements of said tract or parcel of land, and to issue a certificate or certificates to all persons whose improvements are condemned, as herein provided, showing the value of said improvements.

That is the provision for the certificates.

Mr. McDONALD. That, you see, provides for the issuance of certificates for the condemned improvements separate from the others. One is a certificate entitling them to enter so much land at the appraised value; the other is a certificate for the value of the improvements that have been condemned as therein provided. Provision is made in the preceding section of the act for condemning property on the streets and avenues as laid off by the commissioners, and for condemning that upon what is called the permanent reservation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is what the law says:

And it shall be the duty of said commissioners to issue a certificate to each claimant setting forth the amount of land the holder is entitled to purchase and the valuation fixed thereon and also showing the character and the valuation fixed upon the improvements of said tract or parcel of land.

If that does not mean and read that to every claimant who has any improvement upon the land that he claims, there shall be a certificate which states the value and character of that improvement, then I confess that I am carping again, and quite unable to understand the English tongue, so familiar to the distinguished Senator from Indiana. Then it proceeds to add—to issue a certificate or certificates to all persons whose improvements are condemned, as herein provided, showing the value of said improvements.

And—

So that as it reads there are two classes or kinds of certificates. How much they would differ when they came to be drawn up, I do not know; but every claimant, the statute says, is to have a certificate of the valuation of his improvement upon the land that he claims distinct from a statement of the value of the land. Then it adds that every person whose improvement is condemned shall also have a certificate as herein provided, showing the valuation of the condemned improvements. The provision reported by the committee appears to cover every species of certificate of the value of improvements.

Mr. McDONALD. There is just where the Senator is mistaken. Section 10 of the substitute reported by the committee is as follows:

That the certificates issued for condemned buildings by said commission be made receivable, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many are there of those?

Mr. McDONALD. Just as many as there were buildings condemned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I mean not only in quantity, in the number of the buildings, but in respect of the total amount of money that the United States has got to pay for these certificates. That is what it comes to.

Mr. GARLAND. Seventy-four thousand dollars, according to the report of the commissioners.

Mr. McDONALD. The bill here deals with the certificates issued for the condemned buildings, and nothing else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course it is "carping" to point it out, but anybody can see that the act of 1877, which professed to make an end of this business, did not provide for paying anybody for these condemned buildings. I admit that it would be open to Congress, as the Senator from Arkansas says, as it is to do anything in respect of disposing of the public property, to make provision to pay for them.

I am told that in a large number of these instances of what are called condemned buildings because they wanted to put streets where they were, and straighten them, &c., the condemned building was by the very man who professed to own it moved right back on to his claim, and he has a certificate for a building that he has got himself, or if it has been sold he has bought it off at a nominal price because his neighbors would not bid against him, or because it was not worth anything to anybody but him. If this be the fact, as I am told it is, I say it is unjust to make the people of the United States pay that man in dollars for the improvement that he has still got himself, and has moved on to his property. I am sure the Senator from Indiana will agree with me about that.

It is open to serious question how far we ought to go about that particular branch of this subject, saying nothing of the other considerations that have been named. I have been told,—I do not know that it is true, but that is my information,—that you have a certain hotel there called the Arlington, I believe. I do not know the name of it, but some hotel there.

Mr. GARLAND. That is on ground that belongs to the United States.

Mr. McDONALD. That is on the permanent reservation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If Senators will only be good enough to hear me a minute, I will tell my story. I may have got the name of the hotel wrong, but I have been told that some hotel, by whatever name it may be called, or whomever it belongs to, under the authority of this act, or the supposed authority of this act, has been leased for ten years to persons who were the claimants of the hotel, who built it or bought it of somebody who did build it, at a nominal rent of a thousand dollars a year, and that these commissioners have also issued under the provision of the statute that has been referred to, to the same persons a certificate for, I think $30,000, or a very large amount, perhaps $20,000. I think it was $30,000 I was told, certainly a very large amount. That was for condemning that hotel, and there it stands occupied by the very same men now under a lease for a thousand dollars, a nominal rent, and we are to give them the $20,000 or $30,000 of condemned certificates, and they have got the property besides.

I have been told of other instances, two or three, probably more, where in straightening a street, a frame-house would be appraised at what it was supposed to have cost, $1,000 or $2,000, and condemned as they call it, a certificate issued stating this house thus condemned must be taken out of this street, and is worth $1,500, or whatever the sum is. Then the proprietor of the house immediately buys it of the commissioners at public sale. I am not speaking of frauds, I am speaking of the actual transaction, no fraud about it. That is the way it goes. They put it up at auction to get the building out of the street. Who will bid? The neighbors do not want to bid against the proprietor, although he has got the certificate in his pocket, on the theory of my friend from Indiana, which is worth just so many dollars. He bids $5, hitches a yoke of oxen, or a couple, or a dozen, as the case may be, to the side of the building, and slides it back to the rectified alignment. This bill passes; he has got the money, the building, and everything else.

I know this is really "carping," when you take a patriotic, and liberal, and generous view of the business, but at the same time I am not able to see that it is quite just to tax the people to accomplish that sort of thing. I know how perfectly useless it is to talk about such a bill from this one consideration, that it is coming of late apparently to be impossible that anything shall be finally decided and disposed of by the Congress of the United States. We establish a Court of Claims and provide that everybody falling within a certain range of claimants may sue the United States there, just as they could sue an individual in the courts. Men do it, and they get beaten, as individuals sometimes will when they have private suits. The next step is to appear in the Senate of the United States or in the House of Representatives and proceed to ask us (and we are almost always eager and willing to do it) to retry, either on the old evidence or the new, either upon the law or the fact or both, that case, and decide it in favor of the claimant. If we happen to retry it, as we frequently do, and decide it against him, do you suppose that is the end of it? Not by any means. He will only wait for another Congress or another session, when the personnel of the Senate or the House of Representatives is changed a little and people have forgotten that it has been once or twice decided already, and it comes again. The same with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and a thousand times more than with our own decisions, made with a full understanding of the whole case and as the great tribunal of the people, standing perfectly impartial. A decision is made in another Congress. We are urged, and I think with great respect that we do it too frequently, to open the whole thing, begin anew, raise new equities, make new dispositions; and when that is about to be accomplished somebody who is dissatisfied or wishes to gain more or give less appeals to us again and it is again here. Now, that is this case.

The act of 1877 did provide confessedly for a complete disposition of this subject, and that disposition in substance was this: The property belonging to the United States, and there being conflicting claimants against each other, one claiming under one title that turned out to be bad, and another under another that turned out to be bad, the United States owning it all, still these conflicting claimants should have their conflicts adjusted by commissioners of the United States, and they should be allowed to purchase at a fair valuation the property that they had occupied. When I used the term "squatter" I did not use it in any offensive sense. I use it in the great democratic sense of "squatter sovereignty," that was so popular in this country at one time, and it is no offense to anybody that I know of. The occupant is to purchase it. That law is considered; it is discussed; it is investigated, the whole subject, by the Committee on Public Lands, I think it was, of this body, the very same committee that makes this report, and after due criticism and investigation and discussion it is passed into a law. It proceeds. There is not quite time enough for these commissioners within the first limit of the law to accomplish this quasi-judicial duty. The time is extended. At last they have accomplished it, and as the committee report, they have accomplished it as well as anybody could expect, justly and fairly on the whole, making errors no doubt as we do, as we may now, as the courts do, but they have done it.

The next step is exactly what I have been trying to call the attention of the Senate to as an unwise thing. The next step is to come again, to open the subject for further litigation in one instance, and then to change the whole basis of the act of 1877 in respect of what is called the equity of these occupants. It may be if this had been a case de novo I should have been quite willing to give these lands to those gentlemen who occupy them, at half their value; but we have once considered it completely, and have determined deliberately that this disposition should be made, and it has been made. Rights have become settled and fixed; undoubtedly changes of ownership in the mean time would go on in the community; and yet for the benefit of somebody or everybody, as the case may be, (probably it will not work very equally at that now,) all this thing is to be changed, and half the valuation is to be taken.

Mr. President, I am sorry that I cannot see my way clear to do that thing. The sooner the Senate of the United States takes up the notion that it is not to be a body in the nature of a permanent committee of safety to whom every dissatisfied person whose case has been decided once, twice, or thrice is to come again, making it our duty to open and continue to try over and over again the subjects that we have once impartially disposed of, the sooner a great public benefit will result to the Government of this country, I think, in a great many ways.

My duty is done, Mr. President. I will not waste your time and that of the Senate, who are impatient, to look closely at some of the details of this bill. As I say, my duty about it is done.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not profess to be familiar with the terms either of the bill as it passed the House or of the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands which is now before the Senate. The Senator from Vermont has referred to a case of which I have some familiar knowledge, as exhibiting a great outrage, as his language might be interpreted to mean, upon the United States. That is the case of the Arlington Hotel, at which, when an invalid, I had the pleasure and benefit of staying for nearly a month. The great hardship that the United States and the great wrong that these men get the advantage of lies just in the simple fact that they built an expensive, commodious, and elegant hotel at an expense, there said, and I should so judge from its size and conveniences, of $75,000. Without any disrespect to the previous accommodations, it may be said to have been the first hotel of what is called a first-class character that was erected there.

When the title was adjudged to belong to the United States, these men found themselves without any property. Their hotel was on land that belonged confessedly to the United States. Of course they made no resistance, and could make none. When we were passing a bill to settle that portion of the domain that lay outside of the permanent reservation—for this hotel is on the permanent reservation, which the United States is never going to part with, and very properly—the question remained whether this should be an absolute, a heartless, and a cruel confiscation, and a great inconvenience beside to the public. We agreed then, the Senator from Vermont growling a little over it, that these men might actually occupy an acre of ground in the heart of the Ozark Mountains, in Arkansas, at the cheap rate of $1,000 a year ground rent. I should like to know where in many Southern, or Western, or Eastern States an acre of ground is worth a thousand dollars a year ground rent outside of a large city. Yet all the United States had to give these men was the simple acre of ground, more or less, and I believe less, that they are occupying with that hotel and its appurtenances; and the United States, as I said, rather grudgingly told them, "You can only have it at that rate for ten years," and then the hotel, which cost double or treble when prices were higher what it might be built for now, is to be theirs no longer.

Mr. McDONALD. We have the right to terminate the lease at any time.

Mr. BLAINE. We have the right, but there was an implied promise that they should occupy it for ten years, and the United States is usually very faithful in observing those promises.

Mr. McDONALD. The law expressly provides that the lease may be determined at any time.

Mr. BLAINE. That I say is the implication, and that implication is good to them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How does the Senator get the implication?

Mr. BLAINE. That they might pay a thousand dollars a year. Ten years was the utmost put in as a limit beyond which the Government did not go at all. I believe there is an absolute dispossession to take place at the end of ten years. Am I not right?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir; the lease terminates absolutely in ten years.

Mr. BLAINE. It absolutely terminates in ten years, and may be terminated to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it may be terminated to-morrow; but the Senator says there is an implication that it may not be.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, well, when the United States gives a limit of ten years of that kind, even reserving the power, it is a power which I repeat is not often exercised until the ten years are up. I think probably the Senator from Vermont might be willing to exercise it, but I do not think he would find many with him. Therefore, these men hold it for ten years and are entitled to it for ten years by equity, whether by law or not.

The Senator from Vermont presents it as an extraordinary case that when the United States shall turn those men out, neck and heels, and take the property which cost them $75,000, which it is worth, I understand from the Senator from Arkansas, $28,000 should be allowed for damages, in equity or under the betterment law, as we say down in Maine. That is an extraordinary outrage!

I do not know whether this bill is a wise mode of settling the case or not. I do not know as yet whether I shall vote for it. When I came back from a tarrying of a month there I was very strongly persuaded that the best mode of settling the Hot Springs controversy that could possibly be adopted was what I shall state, if the Senate will indulge me for a moment. The United States there own four sections of land, twenty-five hundred and sixty acres. The title was decided to vest in them. It is a very remarkable spot. It is in the heart, as I said before, of the Ozark Mountains. It has these very extraordinary springs upon it, springs which are beneficial to a larger class of human ailments than probably any other springs in the wide world, and in the opinion of many competent medical men, both of Europe and America, the most valuable springs for medical treatment to be found anywhere in the world. The United States, I think, have wisely resolved that the title to those springs shall always remain in the Government. I believe it would have been a wise thing never to have parted with, I believe it would be a wise thing not now to part with, a solitary inch of the land there, but let those who come in and those who are now holding by possessory, or squatter, or equitable right, or what not, pay a permanent ground rent, and we should derive from that an annual revenue for the improvement and beautifying and upbuilding of that great sanitarium. What would readily come by way of revenue from that source would go a great way. I suggested that to the honorable Senator from Vermont, whose legal opinions we are all glad to follow. He may now forget it, but he told me, and I then ceased to agitate the question, that he did not see exactly how that could be done, that the United States should be the landlord to a lot of ground-renters. But as the United States owned the entire four sections of land, I did not, in my unsophisticated horse-sense view of things, see any difficulty in letting permanent leases, for nine hundred and ninety-nine years, if you choose, be given to men on a ground rent. The equitable value of that mode of adjustment would have been that it would not have affected injuriously any present holder, it would not have oppressed any man, and the ground rent, even at a very low percentage upon the absolute value of the property, its salable value, would have made a very considerable revenue, and one continually from year to year increasing.

I do not think the United States out of a great beneficial institution to so many as that would prove, ought to seek to make money, nor do I think at the same time that the United States ought to be called upon to pay money to keep up a watering-place in any way; but let the one hand wash the other, as we say in country phrase; let the property secure its own revenue; and let that revenue be judiciously expended from year to year in the necessary roads and bridges and sewerage and mountain paths and what not that might be required there; in the improvement of free baths for anybody who might choose to use them. I think very great good would have come out of it, and I think now that would have been a much easier settlement and one much more easily made by every person who holds there under color of title.

While I was at the springs, I will say here parenthetically, I think I talked with a hundred persons who are interested, possibly more; I talked to large crowds of men who came to see me about it; and I did not hear one person, from the largest claimant to the smallest claimant, white or colored, say that that would not be to them a God's blessing; that they could take that land and hold it for a small ground-rental, 3 per cent. if you choose, upon its estimated value, or 2 per cent. Three per cent. would not have proved oppressive, for it would have continued increasing in value, and the revenue would have been no oppression whatever to the holder; the revenue would have been a very valuable income for a purpose which I do not see now any mode that is to be provided for except to rent it to individual enterprise. The trouble about individual enterprise is that the United States has already resolved not to part with the title in the springs. I presume the United States can put those springs up at auction and get $1,000,000 to-morrow for them; I presume more. I am told that one of the claimants to this suit, when it was decided in favor of the United States, had a standing offer from parties who had largely been interested in Saratoga, to pay him a million cash for the property if his title was verified by the Supreme Court. But the title has gone into the United States; and if the United States shall now simply sit down and make no provision and do nothing toward the improvement of that great and valuable property, and will not sell the property which individual capital would so soon take up and so rapidly improve, I think its great value is about half sacrificed, and I think the settlement we are making here to-day is having no regard whatever to the great object in which the whole people of the United States may be said to be interested.

This is an easy mode, or I presume designed to be an easy mode, by its generous equity, if I may use that phrase, of adjusting the claims of the individual settlers there; but the bill, I am sure, does not go far enough, and does not take within its scope and object that which is of far greater consequence and far greater and more outreaching value to the people than the mere settlement of the rights of the squatters. I would rather give it to them, if something cannot be done that will tend to improve and make accessible, on an easy and free basis to the people of the United States, the great value of those waters.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, as the objections urged by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] go to the entire bill and every feature of it, I might just as well say now all that I expect to say in regard to this measure or any measure pertaining to this object, for if we pass through his objections there will not be much difficulty in the way of settling upon the bill in some shape or other.

I will begin where the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] left off. The bill before the Senate does not contain anything but fixing the titles to the lots at Hot Springs in individuals. The act of the 3d of March, 1877, the perfection and the completion of which act this bill now seeks to effect, had that object in view. The question of the improvement of the permanent reservation and the giving of the water to the public in the best possible shape is not now before the Congress, and cannot be, in virtue of the act of 1877, until these private claims are determined in some way.

That the Senate may understand me, I repeat that the question as to what the Government will do with the reservation upon which are all of the hot springs is not before Congress, and cannot be at this time, for until the Government settles the title to the outer part of the property in individuals, she is in no attitude to say just exactly what is the value of what she has there, where it lies, its compass, its length, its breadth, and its depth, if you please. What the Government will do with that will be no particular concern to me, any further than what it may do with the navy-yard at Brooklyn, or the fort at Niagara, or any other piece of public property in any other State. The immediate question at hand is what shall we do now to perfect and carry into execution the objects of the act of 1877.

Going backward instead of forward, let me commence with the Arlington Hotel property, and I wish Senators to pay attention to this particularly. I could disregard very well, and so could the committee, all the talk upon this subject because there is nothing before the Senate in a legal or parliamentary shape about it. The report of the commissioners, which is elaborate, does not make any mention specifically of that subject, and all the trouble about that in the mind of the Senator from Vermont, comes from the "They Say," which is notoriously the biggest liar the world ever heard of. I will venture the assertion that he has not got the statement of any responsible man upon that subject. Who it is or where it is he does not state, but he says he has heard somewhere, in the air or round about Washington City, or somewhere else, something of the sort.

The law of 1878 directed the lease of this Arlington property, and not merely the Arlington property but other property there, with this proviso:

That said leases shall in no way prejudice any legal right that any person or persons may have acquired, under the act hereby revived and contained, to any improvements on said ground.

That is the express proviso in the act that makes the lease for the Arlington property and these other properties. Rugg & Co. were the lessees of this property, and they have a certificate for twenty-odd thousand dollars, for the property was condemned, because it was standing right over a hot-water spring, and therefore in the reservation. They are entitled to it, because the law says that the lease shall not affect their right to the condemned property or the improvements upon it. This lease is within your grasp now; you can tear it to pieces; you can destroy it, if you please. As the Senator from Maine has well said, it is only the sum of $1,000 a year. But not only the Arlington Hotel but other property is mentioned here.

The commissioners make no report of that fact. Why? Because they recognized the force of the law which declared that these people were entitled to this condemned property, the certificate for which they hold, just as much as I am entitled to my property a mile and a half further off. So the Senator from Vermont is making a shadow and fighting it. That is the law which stands in the face of these men, and they are just as much entitled to the amount of that certificate as any one else who has any obligation of the Government.

I want, as my colleague does, to be perfectly fair about this matter. We have had trouble enough with it. If the Senate can fix it any better, I say amen. If any one now has any doubt about the Arlington property, I wish to know it before I proceed further, for I shall have no more to say on this proposition after I get through with the remarks that I am now making.

The Senator from Vermont also found a ghost in reference to the certificates of appraisement for property, and the certificates generally for condemned property. I will explain to the Senate how that is upon the face of the report of the commissioners. After stating that they had the property surveyed and laid off and a map of it made, the commissioners say:

Seventh. Maps in sections, showing the several claims as nearly as possible as originally made by the claimants. These claims were imperfectly described in the petitions, and the plats filed with them were inaccurately drawn in many instances, but with sufficient certainty to enable the commission by the aid of personal inspection, by surveys, and by testimony, to fix their true location upon the ground.

It was impossible to put these claims upon the general map. The number of certificates issued for the right to purchase land is six hundred and forty-seven. These certificates have been issued from books provided for that purpose with stubs, upon which, in addition to the substance of the matter contained in the certificate, is a receipt from the claimant or his agent or attorney.

Each certificate of the appraised property says that the person holding the certificate has preference to buy at the appraised value, and here is a list appended of those. Keep those separated from the other certificates. This is a certificate which a man holds to a particular lot; he presents it to the land officer to show that he is entitled to buy it at that price. That is all there is of it; so there is no Jack-in-the-lantern in that. Now we come to the other certificate:

The number of certificates for condemned buildings is one hundred and seventy-two—

That is separate now from the appraised certificates, you see—

And the amount covered by them is the sum of $74,696.

There is the list of those on pages 14 and 15 of the report. The certificate for this condemned property under the act of the 3d of March, 1877, is based upon that construction of the statute, it has been read already, that the commissioners should condemn this property and have it removed from the reservation and fix a value thereon, and give the party owning the property a certificate therefor. The commissioners say they have done that, and they have a stub to each of these certificates upon their books and a receipt from the person to whom issued, his agent or attorney. There the law of 1877 stops. Tell me what that valuation was had for? Tell me what that certificate was given for? Was it to make thumb-papers out of by those who held them? Was it to make paper to plaster their walls with? It was given for the purpose, some day or other, of the United States in a general settlement, taking them up at their face value.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What has become of the property, the buildings?

Mr. GARLAND. The commissioners make no report of what has become of the property condemned.

Mr. McDONALD. They were authorized to sell it at public auction.

Mr. GARLAND. They were authorized, of course, to sell it, but what has been done I do not know any more than the Senator from Vermont, who has heard certain reports about it. I am now arguing the law of the case upon the facts as made public to the Senate and to the world by the commissioners in their report.

I hope the Senate has noted carefully the distinction between the two sets of certificates. That is the important point. The act of the 3d of March, 1877, stops when it says the commissioners shall issue a certificate, evidently the Senators and Members meaning that further legislation would have to be passed by Congress to settle this matter. It leaves the door open for further legislation, because that act does not say what shall be done with those certificates.

Now we come to this bill, and here we propose what shall be done in our judgment and in the judgment of the Committee on Public Lands. Keep in your minds that here is an obligation upon the Government. She has got to meet it some time or she has got to repudiate it. Which shall she do? If she pays it, what is the difference between paying it now, by letting these persons take it up in these lands, or after awhile? It is simply swapping from the left hand to the right, and from the right hand back to the left. The simple proposition presented by the bill is whether those who hold $74,000 in certificates may enter land with them, so that we shall not have to make any appropriation hereafter to take them up.

The commissioners' report makes no statement as to these persons taking the houses off the land by oxen, or steers, or something else, and selling the same property and buying it back, and all that rigmarole that somehow or other found its way into the head of the Senator from Vermont. It would be impossible in the nature of things to provide for issuing warrants or certificates of this sort without allowing a chance to some one to take advantage of the market for them, to profit by them, perhaps at the loss of others. That has been the case under the acts of Congress allowing the issue of soldiers' bounty warrants and under all acts permitting scrip or warrants of any kind to be issued. Notwithstanding all the talk in that regard, I have had nothing laid before me, and I am satisfied the committee has not in any tangible way, to show that any person has profited by fraud or otherwise in reference to certificates issued in good faith. Now, will Congress leave them open to be paid hereafter, or pay them now by allowing them to be a set-off in the hands of persons who may enter these lands with them? I think the latter is the most correct and the least expensive way of settling the transaction.

I wish the Senate to keep in mind always the difference between the two sets of certificates, one for the appraisement of land, upon which the persons have the preference in the right to purchase; and the other the certificates for condemned property which the Government contemplated in passing the act of March 3, 1877, to pay at some time. That is all there is of that.

The next point to be considered is the propriety of allowing a review in some form to persons who consider themselves aggrieved by the finding of the board of commissioners. I was not in the Senate when the act of March 3, 1877, was passed, but taking it for granted that it is true, as the Senator from Vermont says is the meaning of the act, that it was intended to be a finality, yet we see by the very face of the act itself that it is not a finality. A board of commissioners go down to exercise the functions of judges, the functions of a court, to decide questions of law and fact; that is, the question of law as to the possessory right under this gratuity of the act of the 3d of March, 1877, which must be established of course upon fact. These commissioners take the testimony and they adjudicate. Some persons say "we are aggrieved with the finding; it is wrong in this particular case." The bill says, "Very well, you may go into the Court of Claims with a certiorari upon that very record, and if there is error established the finding shall be set aside; if there is no error found, it is to be permanent."

This had to be so because the records have been brought from Hot Springs and are now deposited in the Interior Department and the commission is out of office. There is no appeal allowed from the Court of Claims. They are here at the seat of Government, just exactly where the records are. It is a direct proceeding; no witnesses are brought here, no person but the parties. The United States has its day in court, if it wants to make any objection to any contest, and the question then becomes a pure question of law upon the facts revealed by these records. Is this finding correct? That under the bill is circumscribed within a certain time. In the mean while as to the other lots the law is enforced by the Interior Department; the land offices go forward and enforce it and permit citizens to purchase, and thus close up this business. Now, where is the great damage, where is the great evil to result to the Government from it? It is very questionable under this form of government of ours whether any board of commissioners should be clothed with absolute power, without some authority somewhere to review their findings upon such important matters.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Is there any question in the Senator's mind as to whether unless we disturb their finding it can be disturbed otherwise, or will it be final? Suppose we do not disturb their finding?

Mr. GARLAND. That the Senator from Iowa may understand me I will state that whenever Congress washes its hands of this matter, and the Department washes its hands, and these lands, or lots, or blocks go into the possession of any persons under certificates or patents, the courts are open, as they should be in any other case of a patent, for inquiry as to fraud, mistake, or anything of that sort. This proceeding, if the Senator from Iowa will consider for a moment, does not go to that extent. It simply asks for a review upon the very record itself, and nothing more, to see whether or not the three commissioners have decided properly upon the state of the facts in reaching what is known and recognized as a right of occupancy under the act of 1877. The delay will not exceed ninety days, and we are informed that it will not probably exceed twenty or twenty-one cases. Some of the parties desire to have these findings opened. It is a small right to be accorded to them. The right of appeal is a very dear one, especially to all practicing lawyers, in this country. This bill cuts all of us out of it as a matter of course, because it is in the Court of Claims, and we are not permitted to practice there.

Now, let me say a word as to the situation of the parties upon this property. There is a great error existing in the minds of many people in reference to that, which I wish to remove now if I can, so far as the Senate is concerned. The Senator from Vermont used and somewhat indiscriminately at times the word "trespassers," and at other times the word "squatters." There is neither trespasser nor squatter on the Hot Springs reservation, and that is what I wish now to make clear, if I can, to the mind of the Senate. John C. Hale propounded a claim to the quarter-section upon which the Hot Springs are located, based upon the pre-emption act of 1814, before the register and receiver of the proper land office, and after taking his proof they divided, one deciding that Hale had made out his pre-emption claim and the other deciding that he had not. The heirs of Belding propounded their claim to the property under the pre-emption act of 1830, as amended by the act of 1832. The Belding heirs received a certificate of entry under the order and direction of A. H. H. Stuart, when he was Secretary of the Interior. Rector was asserting his claim under the act of February 17, 1815, to a little more land than one hundred and sixty acres, that is two hundred arpents, which was one hundred and seventy acres, and which went beyond the boundary of the quarter section of Hale when it was surveyed. Under the laws of Arkansas, certificates of entry are made the foundation of actions in court. You may eject upon them, and you may maintain your possessory right upon them. The statute of Arkansas in 1853 extended the same benefit to the New Madrid certificate, one of which Rector had in his pocket.

These three claimants were contending for this property under these general acts that I have stated, for over twenty years in the Departments and in the courts. A trespasser or a squatter is one who goes upon lands without any title or any color of title. All three of these persons had as good color of title as color of title can be made, because when you go beyond the mere boundary line of color of title you come to title itself. A color of title is simply a title apparently good upon its face but which when examined is not a title. That is all the legal definition there is of color of title.

Gaines maintained actions of ejectment upon his certificate and they were affirmed by the Supreme Court. Rector maintained actions and they were sustained by the courts. And yet it would be a most cruel abuse of language to say that these men were trespassers or that they were squatters upon the public domain, because as far back as the case of Carroll vs. Safford, in 3 Howard, afterward affirmed in Witherspoon vs. Duncan, 4 Wallace, and again reaffirmed in the case of Stark vs. Starrs, in 6 Wallace, it was held that, although the patent had never issued the right to a patent once vested is equivalent to it as respects the Government dealing with the public lands. The patent had never issued; the case was not as one of individual property; and yet the Senator from Vermont talks about these people being trespassers or squatters! In the celebrated case that came from California of Whitney vs. Frisbie, Judge Miller went very far in turning the law from the old construction of the Departments and courts as to pre-emption. He went so far as to say that where a man held a certificate of entry or purchase he was not a trespasser or a squatter in any sense of the word.

Now, what does all this teach? That the Government of the United States stood by for twenty years and saw this going on, and never interposed to stop it until by the act of 1870 she agreed to put herself in the Court of Claims to contest the right to this property. During this time no less a person than Reverdy Johnson gave two opinions as Attorney-General that Rector was entitled to a patent for this land; and at last when it was rejected by the court it was upon a worse than technicality, that the recorder of land titles failed to note and record his survey, as my colleague has stated—a doctrine that a party loses his rights when he has done all he can or should do under the law, because some mere ministerial officer fails to do his duty—a doctrine never before known or enforced in a court of equity from Lord Bacon to Judge Bartlett in Arkansas.

The Senator from Vermont, who is versed in the legal lore of the country and the proceedings of the Departments, says that Rector and these men were squatters. No less a man than A. H. H. Stuart ordered a certificate of entry for Gaines, representative of the Belding heirs. Pending this litigation Gaines, Rector, and Hale agreed among themselves to a kind of partition of the property that each could hold undisturbed by the other, and during the holding of these thirds, if I may so call them, many persons rented, some from Hale, some from Gaines, and some from Rector. The persons so holding as renters sometimes would not pay their rent, and proceedings to put them out by ejectment, and there were actions for forcible entry and detainer. Where there was a recovery the cases were carried to the supreme court of Arkansas, and it decided every time that the persons who had given these leases were entitled to do that; and yet the landlords were trespassers and squatters, according to the Senator from Vermont!

When the decision was made by the Supreme Court of the United States in 2 Otto, which was delivered in the spring of 1876, the Supreme Court held that because neither of these three claimants had ever yet perfected his entry and pending the prosecution of those equities the act of the 20th of April, 1832, came in, which was a reservation and cut them all off from perfecting them, and that made the property vest in the United States; but all this time we stood by and saw these persons there on these lands in that condition, upon which children and children's children had been born and raised, and the Government never took it upon herself to eject them or put them out. Even after the decision of the Supreme Court in 1876 she did not put them out, but she kindly took them by the hand by the act of 1877, and said, "We will recognize you here; as you know, we have permitted you to stay here, and stay here under color of title, and now we will give you equity," and that is the equity that this commission was sent down to adjudicate and to determine.

Before the board these parties and all persons who had improvements there, thinking that they came within the purview of the act, appeared and presented their claims, and they were adjudicated. Here is the list of the adjudications, the prices and all affixed. The sole question, the Senate will bear in mind, under the act of 1877, was whether any person had the right of occupancy previous to the decision of the Supreme Court and up to it; but no one should come in after that decision, which was delivered in the spring of 1876.

The commissioners have found; they have adjudicated; certain persons want their adjudications reviewed and all want what is contained in the other sections of the bill—that is, a reduction of the assessments.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Can the Senator say how many persons desire to have a rehearing; how numerous they are?

Mr. GARLAND. I have stated that my information and that of my colleague is that there are not exceeding twenty or twenty-one who desire a review as provided here.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator answer me another question, whether in case a review was allowed, that fact would probably induce others, who are now, perhaps, reasonably well satisfied, to ask for a review?

Mr. GARLAND. I would answer the Senator very cheerfully, but I have no information on that subject at all, and I suppose if this bill were kept here for the next three months we should not get any more information on that point than we have at present.

These few want a review; all of them desire a reduction of the assessment which brings me now to the other feature of this bill.

There is no charge that the commission assessed this property in an exorbitant manner or for an exorbitant sum in itself. What I mean by that is, that I take it for granted from all the information we have that every piece of property they have assessed is worth the amount assessed upon it. That is true; and I have no doubt that if that property were put up at public auction the great majority of it would go far beyond the assessment put upon it by the commissioners. Their assessments range from one thousand seven hundred and odd dollars down as low as $10 per lot, averaging, as the Senator from Indiana has shown, $318 an acre, to one-half of which we propose to reduce the price.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Is the Senator very much interested in retaining the portions of the bill which allow a review?

Mr. GARLAND. I intend to say a word upon that before I finish.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I think there can be no objection to the rest of the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. I will answer that a little further on.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I simply throw out that suggestion, so that if the bill passes over until to-morrow it can be considered.

Mr. GARLAND. I have intended to allude to that before I finish, but I have my attention directed to another matter now. I will allude to that point before I conclude.

It is true that this property is worth more than it has been assessed at. I am speaking now in the market sense of the word. But looking at the act of 1877, and looking at all the circumstances connected with this case which I have attempted to detail here, can any one say that the Government intends to make money out of the occupants of these lands whose rights she has already recognized by the passage of the act of 1877 and recognized by acquiescence for nearly as long a time as I have lived in this world? She found the occupants there on the ground and she dealt with them thus kindly. The occupants have held that property, as the report of the committee says, under adverse circumstances for several years past, receiving but nominal, if any, profits from it.

There have been several terrible devastating fires there, as has been made known by petitions which have come before the Senate heretofore. These have in many instances swept away everything many of them had. One hundred and fifty-nine dollars an acre for ground is more than the United States ever received before, especially when she starts the public domain at a dollar and a quarter an acre. She sold this property at a dollar and a quarter an acre to Gaines. She sold it for a tract of land injured by earthquake in 1815 to Rector; he got it through his assignor, Langlois. Now she is to get, if these assessments are reduced as proposed, $159 per acre. What is the theory upon which that is based? The assessments are over $300 an acre. What is the theory upon which they are reduced? It is this: Out of accommodation to the occupants the United States has sent these commissioners there to appraise this land; they were to deal with the occupants as honestly and fairly and sympathetically as could be done. The Government said "Very well; we have expended and shall expend in all $100,000 or $200,000 to enforce our rights in this reservation, but we must not take that money out of the general Treasury; we shall take it out of you." If the Government is made whole in this respect, I think she ought not in conscience to ask any more. The reduced assessments proposed in this bill, 50 per cent., leave a surplus, including the receipts of the receiver and the money from other sources that she gets there, of from two to three thousand dollars in the Treasury, not counting the value of her own buildings that she has there, which added to that surplus would leave her under any state of the case six or seven thousand dollars clear profit. I prefer, as my colleague did, and as the Committee on Public Lands did, that there should be a surplus; and there are a few little fragments of expense yet to come in, which have not been counted, but the whole of them will not aggregate over $1,000 or $1,200.

That is the theory on which the assessments go. The value attached to this property these people have made themselves by their own improvements upon it; and while it is a large thing financially to those people, many of whom had been born to believe they had as good right to that property as I have to the coat on my person now, it is a mere pittance to the Government. Nobody is taxed to pay it; no person loses a cent. The argument I have heard from the Senator from Vermont on that point amounts to nothing. Not a citizen of the United States loses a cent by this; and the Government has several thousand dollars surplus from the property after giving these persons this little benefit which the bill proposes.

The House bill cuts the price down to $10 a lot. In fairness and justice I thought that was improper. Although I would be very glad to see the Government donate the property to these occupants, I did not think it proper and fair that the Government should be the loser in the operation, and if she comes out whole upon the transaction, I do not think in fairness and justice any person can complain. It is an important matter to these people; it is a mere drop in the bucket to the Government.

The Senator from Vermont finds another great difficulty in the way. He thinks that the General Government should receive benefits from all its lands. This bill does not ask Congress to give any lands to the State of Arkansas. There is no claim of that sort. The State of Arkansas is not asking for it; but citizens of Arkansas come and ask you for this favor or gratuity, if you call it so, and many of these citizens are persons from the various States of the Union—New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, and elsewhere. Hot Springs is now the most cosmopolitan town in the world for its size. I ask the Senate in all sincerity and in all conscience if this is exorbitant, if this is an outrage either upon justice or fairness when you are trying to deal out equity to these people?

Now, as to the question asked me by the Senator from Illinois. Recognizing in the terms of the act of 1877 that there was a disposition to make the proceeding final as near as possible, (although as I stated before I was not in the Senate when that was passed,) and recognizing a fact outside of that action, which is as old as the law can possibly be, that it is to the public benefit that there should be an end of litigation, I have more reason probably than any other man in public life to desire that there should be an end to this litigation and to this trouble. For eighteen years, long before I was in the Senate I was connected with the litigation in reference to the Hot Springs, and I know every foot of this land and can go blindfolded now I believe over every inch of the ground that is talked about. The place itself I love, and there I believe I am loved; indeed this ground is my second home. Hence the feeling I manifest on the subject.

Those persons who desire a review of the finding of the commissioners are constituents of my colleague and myself. They gave good reasons for this desire. We did not consider that we had a right to turn a deaf ear to them, and we have inserted a provision giving a review. We are not tenacious about it if the Senate in its wisdom sees proper to take that from the bill. The Senate may in its wisdom refuse the rest of the bill, and we must submit. We will make no contest for this review by certiorari. It can injure no one; but if a stubborn fight is to be made upon it, rather than endanger the bill and keep the question open, we will yield, as we do on all occasions, complacently to the will of the Senate; but we ask you at any rate to give these occupants the benefit of these reduced assessments, and take up these certificates and end this matter. With me, I hope it is ended forever.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would suggest that the Senate pass this bill over until to-morrow, and we may look at these sections in the mean time and see if there is any change needed. Some gentlemen want to go into executive session now anyhow.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That will do it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RICHMOND AND SOUTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BEALE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5251) to authorize the Richmond and Southwestern Railway Company to build bridges across the Pamunkey and Mattaponi Rivers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COMMERCIAL COMPANY OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. RICHMOND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5252) to authorize the United States Commercial Company of Virginia to do business in foreign countries; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Elections to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the views of the minority of the sub-committee of the Committee on Elections in the contested-election case of Donnelly vs. Washburn be printed for the use of the committee, and that the cost of such printing be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

I will state that the fund for printing reports of this kind is exhausted, and the Public Printer has declined to print any further matter for the committee unless the House will make a special order to pay for the printing out of the contingent fund. The committee is now being delayed in its investigations by the failure of the Public Printer to comply with the orders of the committee. This printing will not cost more than $50.

Mr. KEIFER. There is no objection.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Is this the unanimous request of the committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is, undoubtedly.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

THEOPHILUS P. CHANDLER.

Mr. LINDSEY, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Claims, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 22) for the relief of Theophilus P. Chandler; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

COMMANDER GEORGE A. STEVENS.

Mr. MORSE asked unanimous consent that the papers in the case of Commander George A. Stevens be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that order will be made, and the papers will be referred accordingly, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

There was no objection.

JOHN D. M'KIM.

Mr. WEAVER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5253) granting a pension to John D. McKim; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. BRENTS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5254) amending section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS WITHIN RAILROAD WITHDRAWALS.

Mr. BRENTS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5255) to secure the rights of settlers on lands within railroad withdrawals; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SAPP, for three weeks after to-day, on account of important business.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a resolution of the House calling for all information and correspondence, not hitherto published, in possession of the Navy Department, touching the interoceanic canal; which was referred to the Select Committee on Interoceanic Ship-Canal, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. McMAHON. For the purpose of proceeding with the deficiency appropriation bill, I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 126, noes 12; two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

So the motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McMAHON. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4924) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the point of order made against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like an answer from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] to the question I put to him last evening.

Mr. McMAHON. Do I understand that the question of order is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing really before the committee now except the question of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, what is pending now?

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing but the point of order.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman from Texas who raised the question is not now in his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offered the amendment, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] made the point of order against it. The Chair was pausing, as he saw the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] was not in his seat.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move the matter be passed over informally for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Chair will reserve the point of order for the present until the gentleman from Texas is in his seat.

Mr. STEVENSON. I simply desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio for some explanation as to how this deficiency has arisen in regard to pensions.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, anticipating the question of the gentleman from Illinois, I have made a little more thorough examination than I was prepared to present to the House yesterday. This deficiency arose in the following way: On the 27th of January, 1879, we passed the general appropriation bill for pension purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; that is, for the present fiscal year. The amount appropriated in that bill was altogether $29,366,000. Two days prior, however, Mr. Chairman, to the passage of this general pension appropriation bill, we had passed the bill known as the bill for the arrearages of pensions, to wit, on the 25th day of January, 1879. In that bill no appropriation of money was made to meet the arrearages provided for. On the 3d day of March, however, 1879, just before we adjourned, we passed what is known as the arrearage pension appropriation bill, in which we appropriated for arrearages of pensions, for all claims which had been allowed prior to the 1st of January, 1879, the sum of $25,000,000; and then, as a deficiency for the current fiscal year of 1879, we appropriated $1,800,000 in addition to the money appropriated for that year. The committee will observe at once, Mr. Chairman, that when we passed the appropriations for 1880 it was impossible to include in that bill the increased expenditure of money which would arise out of the passage of the arrearage bill and of the other bills appropriating money for the payment of those arrearages.

I want the committee to understand that the $25,000,000 we appropriated for arrearages of pensions was an appropriation in the nature of back pay on all claims which had been allowed prior to the 1st of January, 1879, and that we are not now appropriating any money to meet any deficiency, as I understand it, prior to that date.

But, Mr. Chairman, we repealed the statute of limitations on applications for pensions, and we established something of a new rule in regard to the time at which the pension should date. Under this new law the Pension Office has been flooded with new applications, and every application which successfully passes through the Pension Department has attached to it not only the allowance of so much a month from the time of the allowance forward, but of so much a month back to the time when the pension under our new law dates. It is to meet these new applications and arrearages accruing under them this $6,500,000 is to be voted.

In reading the amendment at the table, in the peculiar way in which the law is framed, it seemed all the money was appropriated for the purpose of paying invalids of the war of 1812; whereas if it is read properly it would be discovered the provision for the war of 1812 is simply as to a class and not words of limitation covering the total amount appropriated.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me suggest—

Mr. McMAHON. Not now. I will read the original clause in the pension bill:

For pensions for Army invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives—

Now I am reading it right as one class—survivors of the war of 1812, and widows of the war of 1812, $28,400,000.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the surviving soldiers or the widows of soldiers of the war of 1812 would get anything under this bill?

Mr. McMAHON. Unquestionably.

Mr. REAGAN. There is no law in existence which gives them arrears of pension.

Mr. McMAHON. I think not.

Mr. REAGAN. This only provides for arrears of pension.

Mr. McMAHON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it provides for arrears of pension and it provides for quarterly payments as well. The arrears of pension fall under the law which we passed on the 25th day of January, 1879, and the committee is doing nothing in this bill but appropriating money to carry out the express provisions of the statute; and gentlemen thoroughly misunderstand the object of this appropriation in this bill if by its passage one dollar of arrearages is voted to any one who is not entitled to it by laws already passed.

Mr. REAGAN. Can you inform us what proportion in this would go to the soldiers of the war of 1812 and their widows?

Mr. McMAHON. I think the chairman of the committee can answer that question, and I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. REAGAN. I have partly predicated the question on what the gentleman from Tennessee said, which seems to be correct, that this applies alone to arrearages of pension and has nothing to do with the pensions of the war of 1812. I now ask the gentleman the question how much of this $6,500,000 would go to the pensioners of the war of 1812, or their widows?

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] offered yesterday grows out of the arrearages of pensions act. A small per cent. does apply to the soldiers of the war of 1812, but it is all in consequence of the arrearages act. I stated that yesterday. Six hundred thousand dollars out of this sum will pay the arrearages of the soldiers of the war of 1812.

If my colleague on the committee will allow me while I am up—

Mr. McMAHON. Certainly, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. I will make one statement. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] yesterday proposed to reinstate those soldiers of the war of 1812 who were put on the roll by virtue of the act of 1871, but who have since been stricken from the roll in consequence of alleged disloyalty, or in cases where, according to the Department, sufficient testimony has been adduced before the Commissioner to strike them from the roll on account of disloyalty. Now, those soldiers only amount to the number of six, and I think the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] ought not to object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, but will allow these six men to be put back upon the roll, even although they may have testimony that they were disloyal after their restoration by the act of 1871.

I will state further that I am assured by some gentlemen this testimony which has been brought forward against some of these men can be overturned. I had a conversation this morning with the Commissioner of Pensions, and I think there will be no objection, so far as the Department is concerned, to that being done.

Mr. DIBRELL. Let my amendment be adopted and it will cover that very thing.

Mr. REAGAN. Have your amendment read and perhaps I will withdraw mine.

Mr. ATKINS. These men are now upon the roll. They were restored by the act of 1878, and they were on the roll up to 1871, but were dropped on account of alleged disloyalty between 1871 and 1878.

Mr. BURROWS. Is it not a fact that these six men are now restored to the roll?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS. But their pay is withheld.

Mr. ATKINS. That is so.

Mr. BURROWS. Because they obtained some $300 apiece by virtue of unjust restoration, and so pension is withheld until that amount can be liquidated.

Mr. ATKINS. That is true.

Mr. BURROWS. If they did get on the rolls by reason of perjured testimony, ought this money to be paid to them.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not say that.

Mr. DIBRELL. There is no proof the testimony was perjured. I have a case here in my desk where a man was restored to the roll and on the mere letter of a lady was dropped.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand they are all restored, but their pay is withheld.

Mr. ATKINS. That is it.

Mr. BURROWS. Because under the erroneous restoration money was improperly paid, and so it is withheld until that amount can be liquidated.

Mr. DIBRELL. I now ask to have the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that no other amendment is now in order until the question of order made on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is decided.

Mr. DIBRELL. I hope that the amendment will be read for information at all events.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee can be read, and the gentleman from Texas can then withdraw his amendment if he desires to do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Pensions shall not withhold a pension from any soldier or pensioner of the war of 1812 who was granted a pension under the act of Congress of 1871, and was dropped for charges of disloyalty and reinstated under act of 9th March, 1878, and their pensions shall be paid from 9th March, 1878.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the same point of order on that amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. DIBRELL. Then I offer my amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the same point of order on that, and I suggest that it is in effect a private bill. Simply for the purpose of giving private relief.

Mr. DIBRELL. I would like to say a word upon the propriety of the measure rather than upon the point of order pending, because I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. There certainly is neither more nor less of it than giving private relief to certain individuals not of course named in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the case with every pension bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. But this is purely a private relief bill.

Mr. SIMONTON. I rise to make an inquiry of the Chair. What is the point of order of the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has not stated any ground for raising the question of order but one. But the point of order having been made against the amendment, the Chair will of course decide it under the rules of the House.

Mr. DIBRELL. I insist, when this Congress during the present fiscal year has voted more than $60,000,000 for pensions, the point of order should not now be made on a bill that simply proposes to do justice to six old soldiers who have been stricken from the rolls and who are now between eighty and ninety years of age, the whole amount involved not being more than $3,000. I think it would be very illiberal in Congress to refuse to do justice to these men, and I hope the House will not sustain any objection to that being done. There are only six of them that are in this position, and it is an outrage, when we are voting more than $60,000,000, without a word of opposition, to the pensioners of the country, that these six old men should be denied the benefits of this provision.

I do not object to the ruling of the Commissioner of Pensions in this matter. He may have probably done what he considered right. He is an honorable gentleman I have no doubt. But he or his agents acted merely on the letter of a woman—as I showed before the Committee on Pensions—alleging one of these pensioners was disloyal, although he had proved by witnesses and his own oath that he was loyal. And now by the act of 1878 after he was restored they propose to dock him of two or three years' pay which he drew before he was dropped from the roll on the charge of disloyalty.

Mr. MCGOWAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] a question. Does he not know that nearly a score of men were restored to the pension-rolls previous to the law of 1878 who swore to their loyalty, and who were afterward discovered to have been disloyal? Does he not know that a number of them had been officers in the confederate army, and their commissions were found in what is known as the rebel archives and they were stricken from the rolls by reason of that discovery?

Mr. DIBRELL. I do not. That is the first intimation I have had of anything of the kind.

Mr. MCGOWAN. I can produce the record. The written statement of the Commissioner of Pensions to that effect is on record.

Mr. DIBRELL. Does the gentleman refer to soldiers of the war of 1812? My amendment only applies to them.

Mr. MCGOWAN. I refer to soldiers of the war of 1812. I mean precisely what I have said.

Mr. DIBRELL. I do not think the gentleman can show it. I do not believe the facts are as he has stated them.

Mr. MCGOWAN. I can bring you the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions to the effect I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is simply as to the point of order. Does any gentleman desire to address the Chair upon that question?

Mr. CALKINS. Would it be in order to ask that the Clerk read the section of the law proposed to be modified by this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that the law of 1878 be read.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that the law which is proposed to be modified be read.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the act of 1878, as the Chair understands.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask also that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas has been withdrawn and the amendment now offered is one offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL.]

Mr. CALKINS. That is of the same purport, as I understand it. I ask this that the House may be advised as to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the provision in the law of 1878.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the names of all persons now surviving heretofore pensioned on account of service in the war of 1812 against Great Britain or for service in any of the Indian wars, and whose names are stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-roll the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862; and that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, and section 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall not apply to the persons provided for by this act: Provided, That no money shall be paid to any one on account of pensions for the time during which his name remained stricken from the rolls.

Mr. CALKINS. Before section 6 is read I ask whether the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee applies also to section 6 of the act?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment has no reference to section 6.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee be now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Pensions shall not withhold a pension from any soldier or pensioner of the war of 1812 who was granted a pension under the act of Congress of 1871, and was dropped for charges of disloyalty and reinstated under act of 9th March, 1878, and their pensions shall be paid from 9th March, 1878.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALKINS. My inquiry is whether the gentleman offering this amendment reports it by instructions from his committee or whether it is an amendment offered by the gentleman as a member of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendment is offered by the gentleman himself and not under instructions from a committee.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to say but one word. It occurs to me that as the section is materially modified by the amendment, the amendment is liable to the point of order which is being urged against it. But I do not want to take up time in discussing it, the amendment, as it seems to me, being on its face so clearly liable to the point of order.

Mr. SIMONTON. I think this amendment is not liable to the point of order. It certainly changes no existing law. It is intended to correct a construction given by the Commissioner of Pensions to a statute, which construction is that under the act of 1878 he has a right to withhold the pensions of those who were stricken from the rolls after their names had been placed thereon under the act of 1871. It does not change any existing law, but corrects what is deemed to be an erroneous ruling by the Commissioner upon a statute. It cannot be a change of existing law; it is merely an application of the very principles of the law as it now stands.

Mr. HISCOCK. If it changes no existing law, then there is no need for the amendment.

Mr. SIMONTON. Ah!

Mr. HISCOCK. The whole proposition is covered by that statement. If it does change existing law, then it is subject to the point of order which I have made, and which is the same point of order that I made yesterday against the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. SIMONTON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] says that if it changes no existing law then there is no need of it. Suppose that the Commissioner construes a law wrongfully.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman say that the Commissioner has wrongfully construed the law?

Mr. SIMONTON. Suppose he has done so; then there may be a necessity for a legislative interpretation of the law, and we have the right to make that legislative interpretation without changing the law.

The CHAIRMAN. But would it not change the law from this time on?

Mr. SIMONTON. Not at all. If the Commissioner is compelled hereafter to act according to the law, and has not been doing so heretofore, that is not a change of the law; it is merely a legislative construction of the law; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The fifth section of the act of 1878, after providing for the restoration to the pension-rolls of the soldiers of the war of 1812 who had been dropped for disloyalty, goes on to provide—

That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, and section 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall not apply to the persons provided for by this act: Provided, That no money shall be paid to any one on account of pensions for the time during which his name remained stricken from the rolls.

Now, as the Chair understands it, the Commissioner of Pensions holds that if a person who otherwise would have been dropped from the rolls under the previous acts of Congress wrongfully received any part of his pension during the time he should have been so dropped, and is now restored to the rolls by reason of this act, then under the act the Commissioner is authorized to withhold or deduct from his pension the amount which he wrongfully received during the time he should have been dropped. Whether that is a correct construction of the statute or not, the Chair is not prepared to give a positive opinion. At any rate it is the construction which has been put upon it by the officer designated by the law to administer it.

The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] if adopted will be to change that law; or perhaps, to state it properly, it will change the construction of that law so as to prevent the Commissioner of Pensions from charging to these persons who have been restored such money as they may have wrongfully received during the period when they should have been dropped.

The Chair has been informed by the Commissioner of Pensions that this amendment if adopted would affect but five or six persons; still it would change the law as respects a number of persons whether five or six or more. The Chair therefore thinks that it will change the law, within the meaning of the rule; because undoubtedly if the amendment be adopted the Commissioner of Pensions will hereafter be required by the express letter of the law to do what he has not been heretofore required to do by the express letter of the law.

Then this amendment is not offered by the instruction of a committee, nor does it retrench expenditures in any one of the three ways provided by the new clause of the rule. That is, it does not retrench expenditures by "the reduction of the number and salaries of the officers of the United States;" it does not retrench expenditures by "the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States;" and it does not retrench expenditures by "the reduction of amounts of money covered by this bill." It is not, therefore, such an amendment as an individual member can offer, except upon the instruction of his committee.

Mr. SPARKS. The only point is, does it change the law?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it does.

Mr. SPARKS. It certainly changes the ruling under the law; but does it change the law?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it does change the law, because without this amendment the proviso of the act of 1878 is a prohibition upon the Commissioner of Pensions paying to any person who has been restored to the pension-rolls his pension during the time when he ought to have been dropped from the roll. Under the law as it now stands, when the Commissioner of Pensions discovers that he has paid to a person his pension during the time when he otherwise would have been dropped from the rolls, he simply charges it up to that person, and puts him upon identically the same footing as all other persons who did not receive pension during such time as they were dropped from the rolls.

Mr. HAWLEY. Which is the general practice.

The CHAIRMAN. Which the Chair understands is the general practice, not only in reference to this class of pensioners, but to all pensioners under the law. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by reducing the amount $1,000,000. I desire to call attention to the fact that we have here a bill which as reported from the committee proposed to appropriate for certain deficiencies, amounting to $665,530.50. An amendment comes in afterward proposing to appropriate an additional $600,000, making something over $1,200,000. Now we are confronted by an additional amendment, which was sprung upon the House without having been printed so as to notify us that it was intended, an amendment appropriating $6,500,000, making the bill grow by the amendments of the committee from $665,000 to $7,765,000. This amendment is for "pensions for Army invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, survivors of the war of 1812 and widows of the war of 1812, $6,500,000," with some other appropriations, making the amount of the amendment something like $7,000,000.

Now, as explained by the gentleman reporting the bill, this amendment appropriating $6,500,000 for pensions is designed to supplement the appropriation of about $27,000,000 made by the last Congress for arrears of pension. This large appropriation is explained as supplemental to that appropriation for arrears of pension; but the language "arrears of pension" is not in this amendment. In lieu of such language, somehow or other the expression has got in referring to surviving pensioners of the war of 1812, and widows of such pensioners. Why they come in, how they are to be benefited, under what recommendation from the Department they are to be benefited, upon what rule of reason or law they are to be benefited, is not exactly apparent to me, and has not been made so by the gentleman reporting the bill.

During the last Congress we passed an appropriation of $27,000,000 which was to be added to the pensions of soldiers already receiving their pensions. It was passed under very peculiar circumstances. I think I have the right to refer to what occurred upon the floor of the House—that democrats urged other democrats to vote for it, to be ahead of the republicans with the "soldier claim," because the Senate would defeat it; and republicans urged republicans to vote for it to be ahead of the democrats with the "soldier claim" because the Senate would defeat it. I do not like to speak with disrespect of that body which out-demagogued the House, for it was a great undertaking under the peculiar facts of the case. It was using the industries and money of the country as counters in political gambling for the votes of the people. Sir, the time cannot be long delayed when the property and the industries of this country will demand that they shall cease to be gambled with as a means of securing political favor.

Now, here comes another proposition modestly proposing to appropriate $6,500,000 for the same class of soldiers; and it does not even mention that it is for arrears of pensions. This amendment came here with no notice; and this House ought to reject it. The proposition ought to come before the House upon its merits, with notice, so that we can see whether we are to go on in this career of squandering the public money in order to buy political favor with any class of people in this country.

I make these remarks for the purpose merely of calling attention to the nature of this proposition, the circumstances under which it comes here, the objects for which it comes, and the wording of the amendment, which was calculated to mislead, which at least did mislead entirely one of so poor judgment as myself as to its objects. I hope the whole amendment will be rejected. Let it come before the House when it can be fairly considered.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations, had in view no special class of pensioners—no more those entitled to arrears than any other. It is intended to supply some six or seven million dollars in order that the Department may go on and pay all lawful demands for pensions.

Mr. REAGAN. Would the gentleman give the details? That is what we want.

Mr. HAWLEY. Wait a moment. All lawful demands for pensions can be paid out of this money. The question is asked, why is this needed? It is needed for a great variety of reasons. There are many more applications for pensions than there used to be because of the arrears bill, which, of course, increases the amount to be expended, so that it is correct to say, when we are asked "why this necessity?" that it is due to the arrears act in part. But it is not to be charged to that alone; it is due to a great many things. There are changes in the law which swell the general demand for pensions, and the money appropriated is not sufficient to meet that general demand. There is no discrimination, no partiality in this amendment. It is to supply all demands for pensions, and in this debate the discussion of the arrears law is not in order any more than the discussion of the first pension law that the Government ever passed, or any law pensioning soldiers of the war of 1812, or of the Mexican war, or of the Indian wars. Among the demands which make this necessity the arrears pension bill comes. Am I not right?

Mr. REAGAN. I did desire to know the reason for this, but the gentleman has still failed to give it. Just give us the details; let us know what the Department says as to whom it goes.

Mr. HAWLEY. The details are to be found in the several hundred thousand pension claims, and I could not give them in a week.

Mr. REAGAN. But the gentleman, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, could have given us the estimates of the Department to show what it was for.

Mr. ATKINS. I gave them yesterday.

Mr. HAWLEY. I believe they were given yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. I gave them to the gentleman yesterday.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not remember.

Mr. ATKINS. If you examine the RECORD you will find it.

Mr. HAWLEY. The amendments submitted by the gentleman from Ohio follow, in general, the language of the statute. It would have been a little trifle clearer if the words "and for" had been in the law; "for pensions for Army invalids," &c. Let us put in the preposition "for" and see how clear it is. "For pensions for Army invalids," that is, all Army invalids, "for widows, for minors, for dependent relatives, for survivors of the war of 1812, and for the widows of the war of 1812." That is what it is for.

Mr. McMAHON. Insert the word "included."

Mr. HAWLEY. Or the word "included" ought to be inserted.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say I have understood from the gentleman from Ohio this was mainly for arrears of pensions. Then why not mention arrears?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is the largest blank to be filled; but all these things come in and there is not enough to pay the whole general account.

Mr. REAGAN. Why not make the act so it shall read "for arrears of pension?" How can you use it for arrears unless you say so?

Mr. HAWLEY. Arrearage pension is not in the nature of an ordinary claim against the Government. It has merged itself since the passage of that bill into the general pension claim. There is not any more need of specifying that than of specifying a pension for the loss of a leg or arm or anything of that sort. All the specifying that is needed is made in this amendment, which is in the language of the general statute.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw my amendment by consent of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman will allow me a word before withdrawing his formal amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman seems to think no estimate has been made at all for this appropriation. I stated yesterday as plain as language would allow me that the Commissioner of Pensions had stated in his report there would be a deficiency for this year of $5,000,000 for these Army invalid pensions, &c., which I will read:

And there will be a deficiency in the pension appropriation for the current year, as nearly as can now be estimated, as follows: $5,000,000, Army pensions; $30,000, Navy pensions, which should be provided for in order that the pensions for the June quarter may be promptly paid.

I stated that yesterday in the remarks I then made. This estimate has been on the gentleman's table ever since the 1st day of December last, and yet he says he has not seen the estimate.

Mr. REAGAN. As my friend from Tennessee helped to mislead me, he ought not to blame me for it now. If he will look at his remarks, he will find that he did not make the statement in the language of the report from which he has just now quoted; but he stated that this was for arrears of pension. I have from the reading of the amendment supposed in some way the pensioners of the war of 1812 were concerned. I have been trying to find this morning how far they were interested in this; and it was because I was trying to correct the part of it which related to the soldiers of the war of 1812 when the gentleman corrected me and said there was nothing about the pensioners of the war of 1812.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman stated that the entire proposition related to pensions for the war of 1812, and I denied that.

Mr. McGOWAN. What is the question before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the pro forma amendment to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw it by consent of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON.]

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to strike out the last word, and I will yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, I scarcely know how to take the drift of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, for, if I were to take the record of the past, I should suppose he was chiefly desirous of criticising the Committee on Appropriations, because he says we came in with a bill for $600,000, that we then increased it to $1,200,000, and now propose to increase it to $7,500,000.

I ask what difference it makes to him or the House if these appropriations are proper appropriations to be made, and why he has seen fit to criticise the Committee on Appropriations because they have endeavored to put into one bill provision for all the immediate necessities of the Government? He says we come in with an appropriation for these pensions of $6,000,000 which no one had time to consider, but which bill is brought and laid on our tables suddenly. That comes with a bad grace from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who annually rises in his place with appropriations to the extent of six and eight millions of dollars and moves to rush them through under a suspension of the rules—bills relating to matters which none of us know anything about, and a majority of which are not open to any consideration or discussion on the part of the House. It comes, I say, with a bad grace from that gentleman to make the criticism he has this morning.

Mr. REAGAN. It never has been done, but the bill, on the contrary, has been printed and laid for weeks on the tables of gentlemen.

Mr. McMAHON. And that is all we know about it. It was there, but we had no opportunity for discussion; none of the views of the minority on any bill. All we had to do was to go it blind and swallow it whole. Many a steal was put through this House under that bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Never got one for $27,000,000 or for $6,500,000 on it.

Mr. McMAHON. I wish to say in answer to that—

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman say this is a steal?

Mr. McMAHON. I do not yield to the gentleman from New York. I wish to say to my colleague from the State of Texas on this side of the House there is no steal in this, and I am sorry to hear it from him. And when he talks about the motives others have in passing these bills I want him to look into his own conscience and probe it and see whether he is not appealing to some latent prejudice somewhere else.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a law upon the statute-books which we have passed. It was passed by a two-thirds vote. I want to know now if the gentleman advocates the not carrying out of that law. I want to know if he wants to go before the country and say although we have passed a law which has been on our statute-books for a whole year, we will not appropriate money to carry it out. Because you have said these men shall have this, and they shall be entitled to it—

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman has been instructing me in the last few days that we have the right to vote against appropriations under a bad law. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMAHON. Exactly; but did I not draw the distinction before this House that when Congress failed to appropriate money it had a right to determine whether the law was a good law or a bad law? But this is a very different thing. The pension of the Union soldier is a debt which the Government of the United States owes to him. It is a debt which, when he files his application in the Pension Office and when it is allowed, becomes as obligatory on the Government of the United States as the payment of any other obligation of the Government.

Mr. REAGAN. I recognize that as fully as the gentleman from Ohio; but this is not a pension.

Mr. McMAHON. I beg the gentleman's pardon, there is not a dollar in this bill but what goes for pensions under the law.

Mr. REAGAN. This is for arrearages of pensions.

Mr. McMAHON. It simply fixes when that pension shall date. It says it shall date from the time when he was wounded or when he died. I wish to ask the gentleman now does he pretend when the Government of the United States owes a soldier a pension it shall only give him the pension from the time he comes in to apply for it? I wish to say the true way is to give it to him from the time that he was wounded in the United States service.

And we all know in our private experience that many of the most deserving pensioners failed to apply for pensions until extreme want compelled them; and that some of the best men now on the rolls were among these later applicants who were only recently pensioned. I am surprised to hear my colleague from the State of Texas make this statement and use the arguments that he has used here to-day.

Mr. REAGAN. If there will not be more surprise when the people get awake to the fact that we are squandering the public money in this way, then I shall be surprised.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. McMAHON.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 137, noes 18.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAMFORD. I wish to give notice that I will ask for a ye-and-nay vote in the House on that amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Office of the Auditor of Railroad Accounts:
For traveling and incidental expenses of the office, $750.

Stationery:
For stationery for the Interior Department and its several bureaus, $5,000.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to offer an amendment to that section.
The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 74 the following:
For the expenses of the commission on the codification of existing laws relating to the survey and disposition of the public domain, and for other purposes, $15,000: Provided, That said commission shall make its final report upon all the public lands of the United States on or before the 1st day of January, A. D. 1881.

Mr. McMAHON. I hope my colleague will not press that now. It is a matter that the Committee on Appropriations is now considering, and I make the point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. CONVERSE. What is the point of order?

Mr. McMAHON. It is that the amendment increases expenditures, and that this is not properly a deficiency; besides that it is now being considered by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONVERSE. I will say to my colleague that this is a deficiency, and it is not an increase of the expenditures either.

It will be recollected that under a law of last year a commission was raised consisting of five persons to codify the land laws, and also to examine and report to this House some measures for the proper classification and sale of the public lands. This commission has been at work since last June. The sum of $20,000 was appropriated for their payment and necessary expenses. The commission is authorized to exist for a period I think of one year from the time of appointment. The appropriation, as I am informed, has run out.

The commission have already prepared the measures they recommend in relation to the public lands themselves, but as to the codification of the laws no report has been made. The commission is now engaged in codifying those laws preparatory to making their report, a most important part of their work. It will be remembered that the expenses of this commission are comparatively trifling. There are only two of them that are paid out of the appropriation, and they are paid only $10 a day. One of these gentlemen has a large practice which would yield him three or four times the amount he receives as a member of this commission. If he should be obliged to stop now in his work and a delay should intervene of three or four months, he could not afford to return to the discharge of this public business, at the end of that time, at the still greater sacrifice of his private business. The work is being done, the codification is being made, and this appropriation ought to be made now so that the work may go continuously forward and be completed as speedily as possible. I hope the amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. What has the gentleman from Ohio to say as to the question of order?

Mr. CONVERSE. My statement is this: That the amendment provides for a deficiency. The original appropriation was insufficient for the purpose for which the commission was raised.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair understands the gentleman to state the commission was to exist for one year, and this amendment provides for its continuance till the 1st of January, 1881.

Mr. CONVERSE. I will withdraw that portion of the amendment, and ask the appropriation without it if that is objectionable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer his amendment in any form he pleases.

Mr. CONVERSE. Then I offer the amendment without the proviso.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to ask my colleague a question bearing upon the point of order. I wish to ask him whether the original law did not provide for the survey of only a portion of the public lands, whereas he would have that system now extended to all the public lands, according to the wording of his amendment?

Mr. CONVERSE. There was no survey provided originally. The commission was simply authorized to codify the laws and make a classification of the public lands. The classification has already been accomplished, and the report in relation to that has been made to the House.

Mr. McMAHON. But there is something there about including all the other public lands.

Mr. CONVERSE. That is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has modified the amendment so as to omit that part. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] still make his point of order against the amendment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Let the amendment be read as it has now been modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the expenses of the commission on the codification of existing laws relating to the survey and disposition of the public domain, and for other purposes, $15,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not understand that that is a deficiency at all. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to understand whether after the explanation made by the gentleman from Ohio and his modification of the amendment the point of order is still urged.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do urge the point of order and insist that this is not a deficiency at all. There is no law requiring this work to be accomplished within the year. There was a sum of money appropriated for the purpose of commencing the work and it is not absolutely required to be finished during the year. This, therefore, is not a deficiency. If the law required this to be done within the year and the fund was exhausted, then it would be in the nature of a deficiency.

Mr. CONVERSE. Does the gentleman state that the law does not require the work to be done within a year?

Mr. BLOUNT. That is my recollection.

Mr. CONVERSE. The gentleman is mistaken. By the law, as I understand, the commission exists for one year. An appropriation of $20,000 was made. And I will state to my friend this commission has been obliged not only to pay its traveling expenses out of that sum, but to pay for taking testimony, amounting to seven or eight hundred pages, and to pay also for a very considerable portion of its printing. The appropriation is insufficient for the completion of this work of codifying the land laws, which I consider as important as any work before this House. There are now more than three thousand acts relating to the public lands, scattered through nearly a hundred years of legislation, till even the very best lawyers are scarcely able even with protracted research to hunt out and ascertain with certainty the present condition of the land laws. There is no more important work than the codification of these land laws, and it ought to be done at once.

The CHAIRMAN. If it be a fact that the existing law requires the work of the commission to be done within a year, of course this amendment in its present form does not change the existing law, and therefore is not liable to the point of order. The Chair, of course, will accept the statement of the gentleman from Ohio unless the contrary be shown.

Mr. CONVERSE. The commission exists for only twelve months. And I will state further that this additional appropriation will cover all the expenditures of the commission; there will be no future appropriation necessary to complete this important work.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the point of order is overruled; and the question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE.]

Mr. ATKINS. I would inquire of the gentleman how large this work will be?

Mr. CONVERSE. The final report will contain three or four hundred pages.

Mr. ATKINS. Has the gentleman investigated the subject so as to be satisfied that the money heretofore appropriated has all been expended upon this work?

Mr. CONVERSE. I have been so informed by the chairman of the commission, and I have no doubt about it.

Mr. ATKINS. And there is an actual deficiency of $15,000 to complete the work?

Mr. CONVERSE. There is an actual deficiency to complete the work. The entire commission is united in urging that this appropriation be made now, so that they can go forward with the work while they have the clerks engaged in it. If they are obliged to drop out for three or four months it would be a great while before they could get in working shape again. Indeed it is doubtful if we could obtain the services of all the members of this commission after an enforced delay of three or four months.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the whole $20,000 heretofore appropriated been expended?

Mr. CONVERSE. I am so informed by the chairman of the commission.

Mr. BLOUNT. And now they have no funds at all?

Mr. CONVERSE. I understand so.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will ask the gentleman if the object of this appropriation is simply to make a codification of the land laws, or is it proposed to expend it in printing reports and getting up expensive maps, already covered by other maps, for the purpose of sustaining the theories of certain gentlemen in regard to the public lands, which theories I think are erroneous?

Mr. CONVERSE. It will not embrace the publication or the making of any maps. I understand that the work is now all done except the codification of the laws, the collection and annotation of the decisions of the courts relating to the public lands, under the statutes heretofore existing or now in force, and also the decisions of the Commissioner of the Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior on the same subject.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That is all very right and proper.

Mr. CONVERSE. The volume which the commission is now engaged upon is the codification of the laws in relation to public lands, the decisions of the district and circuit courts of the United States, and also the decisions of the Land Department relating to the several questions that have from time to time come before those tribunals since the organization of the Government.

Mr. ATKINS. Without the appropriation now asked for would not the work be incomplete; would not the work of this commission be to a great extent a failure?

Mr. CONVERSE. As I regard it, the work already accomplished by the public land commission is important and valuable, but of far less value than that now in progress and which is to be continued to completion under this appropriation. This is a most important work, important to every lawyer and to every man in the United States.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not prepared to say anything now in regard to the merits of this proposition. It is unusual to bring forward a measure in this way without some examination as to the manner in which the money heretofore appropriated for the purpose has been expended. It was regarded by the Committee on Appropriations at the time the appropriation was made that $20,000 would cover all expenses, and the amount was given upon the estimate furnished the committee. In view of the importance of codifying the land laws of the United States, I wish, so far as I am personally concerned, to waive any objection to the adoption of this amendment at this time, although I do object as a general proposition to appropriations being made in this way, without any examination on the part of those who propose the amendments.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to call the attention of my colleague [Mr. CONVERSE] to the wording of his amendment, which reads "For the expenses of the commission for the codification of the laws." It does not say for what expenses.

Mr. CONVERSE. That is the name of the commission. The style of the commission is "for the codification of the laws and for other purposes."

Mr. McMAHON. I would like to have the expenditure limited according to the statement which has been made by the gentleman on this floor; that it is to complete the codification of the laws.

Mr. CONVERSE. I will make that modification; and I will modify the amendment still further so as to make it read "$15,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose."

Mr. McMAHON. It should read: "Necessary for the completion of the codification of the land laws."

Mr. CONVERSE. I am satisfied to modify the amendment in that way.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Money-order office:

For seven additional clerks for service in the money-order office, namely, two of class 4, one of class 3, one of class 2, and three at $900 per annum, from the passage of this act until June 30, 1880, a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated.

Office of First Assistant Postmaster-General:

For additional clerks in post-offices, $10,000.

For purchase of letter-balances and scales, $2,500.

To provide for increased pay of certain route-agents, who may be promoted to be postal-car clerks, to make their pay equal to that of postal-car clerks, $5,000.

Office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

For mail-route messengers, $10,000.

For additional postal-car clerks, $15,000.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in after that portion of the bill just read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

That the sum of $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the appropriation for stamped envelopes and wrappers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, may be used for the purchase of post-office envelopes required for use during the said fiscal year.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the following:

STATE DEPARTMENT.

For extra clerk hire and copying, $2,000.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in after that portion of the bill which has just been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of State to purchase the manuscript of the revised consular regulations prepared by A. B. Wood, chief of the consular bureau in the Department of State, and approved by the Secretary of State, for such sum, not exceeding $2,000, as shall seem to him a fair price for the work, and to use for the payment of such purchase the appropriation already made by the act of Congress of January 27, 1879, for the expenses of editing and revising the consular regulations.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For furniture and repairs of same, $1,500.

UNITED STATES FISH COMMISSION.

Propagation of food-fishes:

For continuing the work connected with the propagation of food-fishes, $15,000.

Fish-hatching steamer:

For supplying the fish-hatching steamer authorized by and constructed under the act of March 3, 1879, with the necessary fish-hatching machinery and other furniture, $12,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to place the vessels of the United States Fish Commission on the same footing with the Navy Department as those of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE.

For contingent expenses of the Executive Office, including stationery therefor, $1,000.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Southern claims commission:

That the sum of $800, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be transferred from the appropriation for contingent expenses of the southern claims commission, made under act of June 21, 1879, (see Statutes, volume 21, page 29,) to be available for paying the salaries and traveling expenses of the agents of said commission.

Mr. ATKINS. By instructions of the Committee on Appropriations I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 122 insert the following:

And the sum of $1,200, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the unexpending balance of any appropriations heretofore made for the support of the southern claims commission is hereby reappropriated for the payment of a clerk, who may be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at the rate of $100 per month, to complete the records of the said commission, and care for the same, under the supervision of the Treasury Department.

The amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, to come in at the end of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of Justice:

For the payment of the fees and expenses of United States marshals and their general deputies, earned during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, $600,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "general" the words "and special;" so that the appropriation will be for the payment of general and special deputies.

It is not my intention to take very much time in the discussion of this amendment; but there is one point which has been so insisted upon by gentlemen on the other side that I must offer a remark or two upon it. The gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. McMAHON] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB], members of the Committee on Appropriations, have, in discussing this bill, insisted that the amendment I have offered is in effect in conflict with the provision of law forbidding the expenditure of money which has not been previously appropriated. I desire to call attention to the fact that the $600,000 which the committee propose to appropriate to pay marshals and their general deputies is to pay fees which have been already earned and for which no appropriation had been made. It will be remembered that we adjourned at the extra session without making any appropriation for this branch of the service. The gentleman from Ohio pleads against the amendment I offer that it is improper and illegal to make it in the face and eyes of the statute which he has read. When the statute applies to the $600,000 he proposes to appropriate, if it applies to the amendment I have offered, I urge that all fees of both general and special deputies are earned by minor officers; they are not earned under contracts made by any branch of the Government; this money is not to carry out a contract. The proposed appropriation is for services of officers set in motion by law which have been earned in pursuance of statute, and not under a contract, and earned without the violation of any appropriation law or of any general statute.

When gentlemen upon the other side say that they vote against this amendment, and are uninfluenced by or will not obey the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, a serious question arises of the propriety of their action, and I desire to make it clear and emphatic. There is no legal excuse for rejecting the amendment, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court. In the last session the other side resisted the payment of these fees—let the appropriation go over because riders would not be accepted; they demanded in effect that the Federal election laws should not be executed by the United States because of their unconstitutionality. The Supreme Court has passed judgment upon that question, and now the "pale-eyed priest from prophetic cell" comes not forth to lead the democracy; her oracles are dumb; no longer does she obey the voice of the Supreme Court of the United States, but the voice of Mississippi, where we all know elections are conducted in the most quiet and peaceable manner. The voice of Mississippi is heard announcing that "this Congress when it will, will obey the decision of the Supreme Court." Other and new prophets have arisen in Cincinnati, Baltimore, New York City, prophesying if the operation of the Federal election laws is not defeated democracy is lost.

I ask gentlemen on the other side to be frank and fair. It will be as well for you. If you are not, you will deceive no one. Do not plant yourself on the untenable doctrine that the payment of these fees is forbidden by any existing law, for, as I have shown in the very amendment offered by the committee, you propose to provide an appropriation of $600,000 to pay fees which have been already earned, and which stand upon the same footing. You propose to authorize the payment of marshals and general deputies for services which they have performed during the last fiscal year. Let the fact be recognized that it is in obedience to the men of the cities I have named, in obedience to the voice of the State of Mississippi, that your position is taken in defiance of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, and all because a faithful execution of the Federal election laws prevents fraud and insures an honest vote and an honest count.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, when we had the "star-route" appropriation under consideration, the three gentlemen on the other side who most distinguished themselves in favor of adhering to the amount of money that had been appropriated during any fiscal year for a particular purpose were my modest friend from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK], my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY], and my friend from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON]—all members of the Committee on Appropriations. We remember how my friend from Connecticut denounced the conduct of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in connection with the star service; in what emphatic language he said that Mr. Brady had been guilty of violation of law which might lead to his impeachment. Indeed, he was so impressive upon that occasion that the reporter forgot to get down the exact words which the gentleman did use.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman mean the words that I used?

Mr. McMAHON. Oh, no.

Mr. HISCOCK. My words were taken down, and I have nothing to take back.

Mr. McMAHON. The words of the gentleman from Connecticut, it would appear, were not taken down; and, therefore, in quoting them I am compelled to rely upon my memory. But I desire to read the language of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] upon that same question:

But I desire to say to the gentleman from California, and to all gentlemen who have taken the ground that the Post-Office Department has not violated law, that they have misconceived the spirit of the statute; they not only misconceive the spirit of the statute, but the letter of the statute also.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire of my friend from Ohio whether the very $600,000 covered by the amendment which he offers on behalf of the committee is not to pay fees which have been already earned?

Mr. McMAHON. In part.

Mr. HISCOCK. Substantially all.

Mr. McMAHON. In part only; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HISCOCK. When the gentleman says "in part" he covers the whole ground and the whole principle.

Mr. McMAHON. The amendment applies only to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. But the point I want to make is this: heretofore whenever appropriations have been made for carrying out the election laws the appropriation has always been specific for that purpose; the estimates were sent to us in that form. Now, we all know that in this case no specific appropriation and no general appropriation was made for this purpose. I want to know whether gentlemen on the other side understood that the Post-Office Department could not run without a specific appropriation covering the full year? If, for example, we discover that the auditor of railroad accounts cannot examine the books of the Pacific railroads for the purpose of ascertaining how much money is coming to the United States Treasury because there is no appropriation available for that purpose; if the "fish-hatching steamer" cannot be fitted out; if this Government cannot be run in any of its Executive Departments unless appropriations are made therefor, I want to know why gentlemen on the other side claim that special deputy marshals of election, mere political agents, can be employed without any appropriation for that purpose, and that a debt against the Government is thus created?

Mr. HASKELL. I wish to ask the gentleman whether, when the democratic party failed to appropriate money for the marshals of the United States, it was their intention to stop the judiciary of the United States and hold it in abeyance until they saw fit to set it running again?

Mr. McMAHON. That is an awful question, Mr. Chairman. I say no. [Laughter.] In putting that amendment on that bill they simply wanted when you were getting money for the courts you should also take your medicine for the election laws. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASKELL. You failed to appropriate money for the courts; you adjourned without appropriating it. The argument you have used goes to show you meant to stop the judiciary of the United States unless—

Mr. McMAHON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; we passed the bill twice for the payment of the fees of marshals, but your Executive vetoed it.

Mr. HASKELL. You adjourned without making the appropriation.

Mr. McMAHON. We could not stay here all the year to accommodate you; and did not.

Mr. ATKINS. The President vetoed the bill.

Mr. McMAHON. Of course he vetoed it twice, may be three times.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. PAGE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. PAGE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Further amendment is not in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand the proposition offered by the gentleman from Ohio is an original proposition and not an amendment to any particular section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Appropriations through the gentleman from Ohio, in reporting this bill back to the House a second time, reported along with it the amendment already read.

Mr. SPRINGER. There may be two amendments to that, being a part of the original text.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a part of the original text, but is an amendment pending before the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then no further amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Not until this is disposed of.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw his amendment; and I will renew it.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] made the amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I made no amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moved to amend by adding the words "and special" after the word "general." On that amendment debate is exhausted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw it, and I will renew it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Debate has not been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment is in order and no debate is in order until this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw it, and I will renew it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise for the purpose of stating that I have prepared an amendment which I think will meet this view of the question. As I have sent it to the Clerk's desk, I ask it to be read.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not understand that amendment is offered now.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course not, but I give notice at the proper time I will offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. Only one amendment to the amendment can be pending.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now ask it be read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

For special deputy marshals of elections, the sum of $7,600: Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections and general deputy marshals, for performing any duties in reference to any election, shall receive the sum of $2 per day in full for their compensation; and that all appointments of such special deputy marshals or of general deputy marshals having any duty to perform in respect to any election shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the district judge, in the absence of the circuit judge, and not less than two nor more than three appointments shall be made for any voting precinct where such appointments are required to be made, and the persons so appointed shall each be of different political parties, of good character, and able to read and write the English language, and shall be well-known residents of the voting precinct in which their duties are to be performed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state this is the amendment which appears in the RECORD this morning and which I gave notice I would offer.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FRYE. Strike out those limiting, qualifying words "of good character" as it will be difficult to find them on that side. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Those words were put in to meet the case which occurred in the city of Philadelphia at the last presidential election when, by the proof offered before one of the committees of Congress, it was shown those who were appointed were the very worst characters which could be found in that city. I desire to avoid that in the future.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to tell the gentleman—

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot yield.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to tell him how ignorant he is in reference—

Mr. SPRINGER. I have only five minutes, and I cannot yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I desire to state that when I can offer this amendment I will do so, and that I have been authorized by the Committee on Elections to submit this as an amendment to the amendment now pending. The committee have directed me to submit this, but in doing so the Committee on Elections desires it to be understood that it does not bind individual members, but that when the measure comes up it may be that some will support it and some will vote against it. Now this proposed amendment meets everything which seems to be desired by the gentleman from New York, and more. It provides in the future that the number of these deputy marshals at elections shall be limited to not less than two or more than three. It provides that they shall be of different political parties, of good character, and able to read and write in English, and that they shall be well-known residents of the precinct in which the election is to be held.

Mr. CONGER. Is that an attack on the German citizens?

Mr. McMAHON. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that I doubt if he has ever seen a German who could not read.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Germans who vote the democratic ticket know how to read and write in English. I now withdraw the amendment in order that the gentleman from New York may again offer it.

Mr. PAGE. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and desire to say a word only in reference to it. If this amendment is adopted it will enable the disbursing officers of the Government to pay the deputy marshals that were appointed at the election in California in September last. These men, Mr. Chairman, were appointed in accordance with the existing law. The democratic party as well as the republican party in California last year believed, I think, generally that the United States law should be invoked for the protection of its citizens on election day. There were four parties in California last year, and three parties had candidates in the field for Congress.

It is well known to the people of this country that there was danger to be apprehended on election day and for several days prior to the election last fall in California. It is also well known that the leader of one of the political parties assailed the head of one of the other contending parties with an attempt to commit murder, neither belonging to the republican or democratic party. But the inflammable condition of affairs in the State of California ten days prior to the day of election rendered it necessary that the authorities should take every possible precaution in their power in order to protect the people from what seemed likely to be a source of trouble growing out of that election, and with a view that there should be a peaceable and fair election. The military of the city of San Francisco and of the State of California were employed to guard one of these parties who was confined in the county jail for an assault with intent to murder; and numbers of workmen paraded the streets threatening that they would take this party from the jail; and all this occurred about election time. Now, I say that it was right and necessary that the law-abiding people of that State without regard to party should invoke the power of the General Government if necessary for the protection of this people and for the purpose of securing a fair and free election.

On turning to your election laws I find it is provided that the United States marshals at the request of two citizens must appoint deputy marshals for the purpose of seeing that there should be a fair election held and also for the purpose of preserving the peace at the polls. Now, I ask my friend from Ohio in charge of this bill if he believes that the marshals did right in appointing these deputy marshals and if he believes it right that this House should pay the debt. The gentleman asked me yesterday, and I have no doubt that he was serious in his question, if these marshals in California had not been already paid. I know of no sum out of which they could have been paid. I do not think the gentleman seriously believes that the republican party paid the expense incurred under the law. I do not believe that the democratic party or any other party paid the bill, but I do say that it was an expense created exactly in accordance with law, and that the best citizens of that State without regard to party believed it right to have the marshals appointed as a precautionary measure, if for no other purpose. They would have been derelict in their duty if they had not complied with the law appointing the marshals when required to do so. And these appointments were made, and these marshals performed the service, in order to provide that the election in San Francisco and Oakland should be fair and free, and I do hope that this measure of justice will not be defeated here.

I hope that the House, without any objection, will pay these one or two hundred marshals—I do not remember the exact number, but the amount ranges from $20 to $40 each, and I hope that the payment will not be delayed. I do not know the exact amount.

Mr. HISCOCK. Seven thousand six hundred dollars in the aggregate.

Mr. PAGE. And it does not seem possible that that side of the House would refuse to pay these men who were appointed under the law of Congress; that you will now withhold the necessary appropriation for paying these men what they are entitled to under the law.

And let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that the legality of their appointment can no more be questioned than the legality of the general marshals that were appointed by the marshal himself. If it was wrong for him to retain in his employment the general marshals it was wrong then, perhaps, for him to have appointed these extra marshals. But it was no more unlawful in the one case than in the other, because you had made no appropriations to pay the general deputies and no appropriations to pay the marshal his salary, and it was just as lawful for the marshal of California to appoint these marshals on election day as it was to retain under his control the general marshals.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I want to ask the gentleman from California a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. O'NEILL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] renewed the amendment and made a speech and the gentleman from California opposed it.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Illinois withdrew the amendment and I renewed it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not think I want five minutes to defend Philadelphia or Philadelphia elections or the officers who conduct the Philadelphia elections.

During the session of last summer I gave this House what I thought was a very clear view of the conduct of the marshal of the eastern district of Pennsylvania and a defense of the special marshals who had been appointed by him. Now I want to say what hurts the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the democratic party in this House and the democratic party all over this country is this, that Philadelphia is radically a republican city and that you cannot repress its republicanism. And I want to say in reply to the gentleman's slur on the marshal and his conduct there that the democratic Senate of the United States sent a committee of investigation to Philadelphia, that that committee investigated the democratic side of the case, and came back ashamed of itself and afraid to return to Philadelphia to examine republicans who would have come before it and told it the honest truth. It never dared to go to the city of Philadelphia to carry on this investigation.

And if gentlemen will look over the records of the Senate they will see what was done in executive session in regard to the reappointment of the marshal of that district. Marshal Kerns, a gentleman of the highest integrity in his official conduct, was unanimously confirmed by the democratic Senate in executive session, which thus indorsed his acts as marshal.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) How does the gentleman know the confirmation was unanimous?

Mr. O'NEILL. I know it from having heard it.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Ah!

Mr. O'NEILL. I know there are no secrets that are not told out of the executive session of the Senate, and so does the Speaker of this House.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I want to know the gentleman's authority for the statement he made that the nomination was confirmed unanimously.

Mr. O'NEILL. I give it as spoken on the streets of this city—just in the same way as we always get information of what is done in executive session.

Mr. FORT. And did not the committee report unanimously?

Mr. O'NEILL. I was about to state that. Every member of the House knows that we hear everything that occurs in the executive session of the Senate relative to confirmations.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. O'NEILL. The committee reported unanimously to the Senate and the confirmation was unanimous.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call the gentleman to order. The gentleman has no right to refer to the proceedings of the Senate in this House, and especially to proceedings of the Senate in executive session, which are secret.

Mr. SPARKS. Unless he can tell us the means by which he knows it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have referred to that, and my reference has gone into the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. I insist on the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand there is any rule of the House or any rule of parliamentary law which prevents the gentleman from referring to proceedings at the other end of the Capitol; although he is prevented from criticising or calling in question the proceedings there or alluding by name to the gentlemen who participated in those proceedings. The proceedings of the other branch are constantly alluded to in this House.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the gentleman is attempting to state the proceedings of a secret session of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. He is stating the result of the proceedings as he understands it.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I state further I made no attack on Marshal Kerns.

Mr. O'NEILL. But you made an attack on the great republican city of Philadelphia.

Mr. SPRINGER. In that, too, the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will say further in reference to this confirmation, it was opposed strongly by certain democrats. But, sir, the democratic Senator from the State of Pennsylvania rose above party feeling and showed himself superior in his action to the democrats who sought to pull down this respected official, Marshal Kerns. And he permitted that confirmation to be made in the Senate, because he knew there was no cause for rejecting him, as he had simply discharged his duty conscientiously.

Mr. SPARKS. My colleague only attacked the republican party of Philadelphia, not the city.

Mr. O'NEILL. He attacked the citizens of Philadelphia who are republicans and who will remain republicans.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have been interrupted a great deal.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I desire to say but a few words. I do not want by silence to have it understood that I am of the opinion that there was any occasion whatever for United States marshals at the election to which reference has been made. On the contrary, I assert that there was no occasion for them, and the very gentleman alluded to, who was the officer that appointed them, stated subsequently under oath that there was no occasion for them.

Nor do I want by silence to have it understood that the men who were so appointed were of that character of citizens who were entitled to be selected for that particular service. I want to say further, notwithstanding the gentleman's allegation that this officer was recently confirmed by a unanimous vote of the Senate, that he was confirmed over my written protest.

Mr. O'NEILL. That only shows the manner in which Senator WALLACE performs his duty toward a gentleman who was worthy of his support.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] is not entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL. I am much obliged to the gentleman. I want to say something more for the instruction of the democratic party of this House and of the country [laughter] relative to elections in the city of Philadelphia. It is but a few years since republicans by hundreds and thousands were driven from the polls in Philadelphia. That continued until the city of Philadelphia became a republican city, until we were enabled to elect a mayor of the city of Philadelphia and to have a police force that knew how to perform its duty; until we passed a few years ago (and I aided in its passage through this House) the very law under which special deputy marshals are appointed to serve at elections. We wanted a police force and United States marshals at our elections to give the great republican city of Philadelphia an opportunity to express its real sentiments at the polls, and which it had been obliged to express before that time upon election days time and again through blood and the most fearful riots ever known in this country, instigated by the desire of the democrats to keep possession of that city if they could.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman entirely misrepresents me when he says that I attacked the people of Philadelphia. I simply referred to certain special deputy marshals appointed for the elections in that city, who were proved by the evidence before a committee of Congress to have been in several instances persons of the most disreputable character, some of them keepers of bawdy houses, others of them convicts, others of them jail-birds, and others vagrants and tramps who had no visible means of support whatever. They have been proven to be persons of that character by a committee of Congress, and nobody has come to their defense. It was such persons that I attacked and no other. I did not say a word against the good people of Philadelphia. Those persons do not represent even the republican party of Philadelphia.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman says that was proved; it was by ex parte testimony.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was not by ex parte testimony. It was in open committee, where the witnesses were subjected to cross-examination.

Mr. O'NEILL. And the committee laughed in their sleeve while that testimony was being taken.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not see the laugh in the record; but I see evidence of the fact that some of those persons were of the most disreputable character.

Mr. SPARKS. And they were selected "to give the republicans of Philadelphia a chance."

Mr. O'NEILL. The Senate committee never returned to Philadelphia to give these men a chance to defend themselves. I was obliged to bring into this House and put into the RECORD as a part of my speech in April last the affidavits of a number of these men whose characters had been assailed before the Senate committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. So much was proved by the testimony that it was not necessary to return to that city in order to heap up proof upon proof.

Mr. O'NEILL. At all events the gentleman who appointed those men has been confirmed by a democratic Senate as marshal.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Such action could not have occurred in a democratic House.

Mr. O'NEILL. No, not by a democratic House; but by a democratic Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. I raise the point that this debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken; debate has been exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to amend by striking out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. No such motion is in order because an amendment to the amendment is already pending.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to withdraw temporarily the amendment which the gentleman from New York first offered and which was renewed by me; and I wish to yield—

Mr. FINLEY. We object to the withdrawal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] cannot yield, because he has not the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. He withdraws the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the withdrawal. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered originally by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and renewed by the gentleman from California.

Mr. HISCOCK. I trust that there will be no objection to the temporary withdrawal of this amendment, to the end that one or two more gentlemen may speak on the question.

Mr. WRIGHT. If you want debate on it, let it be general.

Mr. HISCOCK. We shall not restrict it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has given notice of an amendment to be offered as soon as this question is disposed of. That amendment will present substantially the same question, at least in one of its forms. The amendment of the gentleman from New York will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "general" insert the words "and special;" so that the amendment will read:

"For the payment of the fees and expenses of United States marshals and their general and special deputies, earned during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, $600,000."

Mr. GARFIELD. We may as well have tellers on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Chair will appoint tellers.

There was no objection, and Mr. McMAHON and Mr. HISCOCK were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 124.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. On behalf of the Committee on Elections I now offer the amendment of which notice has been given.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

For special deputy marshals of elections, the sum of $7,600: Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections, and general deputy marshals, for performing any duties in reference to any election, shall receive the sum of $2 per day in full for their compensation; and that all appointments of such special deputy marshals or of general deputy marshals having any duty to perform in respect to any election shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the dis-strict judge, in the absence of the circuit judge, and not less than two nor more than three appointments shall be made for any voting precinct where such appointments are required to be made, and the persons so appointed shall be of different political parties, of good character, and able to read and write the English language, and shall be well-known residents of the voting precinct in which their duties are to be performed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I also wish to make a point of order.

Mr. McMAHON. I hope gentlemen on the other side will not make points of order upon this. We had a promise yesterday from the other side that something of this kind would be accepted. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] said that the lamp was still burning.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order on the amendment. I suppose it will hardly be claimed that this amendment can be offered under the clause of the rule which we have had under discussion:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

I suppose the proposition is offered—

The CHAIRMAN. It comes from a committee, as the Chair understands.

Mr. HISCOCK. It comes from a committee. Now, the first point I make is based upon the proviso of Rule XXI:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, &c.

I submit that the subject-matter of this amendment has never been confided to the Committee on Elections, and that committee has no jurisdiction of it by any order of this House. It can only acquire jurisdiction under the order and direction of the House.

The next point I make is based upon this language of the rule:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating—

1. To the election of members: to the Committee on Elections.

I submit that the clear intent of this language is that the province of the Committee on Elections shall be limited to questions concerning the election of members to this House; that it is not competent for that committee, even under the direction of the House, to take jurisdiction of a general election law making provision for the future election of members; that the whole jurisdiction of this committee is confined to the investigation of subject-matters relating to the election of members already claiming seats here—that their jurisdiction does not extend beyond that.

Mr. KEIFER. The points of order have been well stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK.] I wish to call attention to a bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and referred to the Committee on Elections, and I will say that this amendment is in substance that bill. I agree that it is not in precisely the same language, but in every sense it is in substance that bill. I take pleasure in sending a copy of the bill to the Chair.

Now I wish to say if this be not true—if it be controverted by the gentleman from Illinois—if he claims that this proposed amendment is not in substance the bill now before the Committee on Elections, then the point made by the gentleman from New York is sound—that this subject-matter referred to in the amendment was never before the Committee on Elections. It was never referred to that committee if it did not get there by virtue of the reference of the bill of the gentleman from Illinois.

In terms the proposed amendment contains more than the bill that was referred. It contains in addition an appropriation, but in its subject-matter it proposes to change existing law in relation to the special deputy marshals and their mode of appointment. The objection must go, of course, to the whole amendment. If the amendment simply proposed to pay these special deputy marshals in the State of California, the objection would not be good, and I think I am safe in saying that no objection would be made, at least on this side of the House, to such an amendment. That amendment would be entirely in order, because this is a deficiency made in accordance with law. I know it is that sort of deficiency that my colleague [Mr. McMAHON] undertakes to say the Congress of the United States ought not to make good. But, Mr. Chairman, while I do not characterize that utterance of my colleague, I wish to characterize the conduct of the Congress of the United States in refusing to make appropriations which are in exact accordance with the mandates of law. It is not cowardly to refuse, but it is doing that which will be denominated before the country and the world dishonest not to appropriate money to pay a debt which has been contracted in exact accordance with law.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that my point of order must go to the whole of this proposed amendment; and I wish to have it distinctly understood the gentleman can make proper appropriations but in this way. He cannot change existing laws. We do not wish either to have a repetition of what we have had in the early days of this Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Ohio, who has just taken his seat, makes the point of order, first, that the subject-matter of this amendment has not been before the Committee on Elections; and, secondly, that the subject-matter of it is before the Committee on Elections, and for that reason is not in order.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman will understand me: I say that it is not before the Committee on Elections unless it gets there by virtue of a bill which the gentleman has introduced; and if it does get there by virtue of that bill, then he can only report in accordance with the subject-matter contained in that bill. If it is not in accordance with that, then it should be ruled out upon that ground.

Mr. SPRINGER. A bill is pending before the Committee on Elections, as appears by the RECORD, concerning the election of Representatives in Congress. It is not necessary to look into that bill any further as to the subject-matter of this amendment. The subject-matter of the election of Representatives in Congress is now before that committee. Therefore on that ground the point of order is not well taken.

The next question is, whether it is in substance the bill pending before the Committee on Elections. In order to be in substance the same it must in terms or words sufficiently plain represent the substance of that bill. It does not do so, and the gentleman cannot pretend that it does.

The bill before the committee contains three sections, one in relation to supervisors of election, another in reference to deputy marshals of election, and the third in reference to arbitrary arrests by such marshals of election, so that the substance of the bill is not embraced in the pending amendment nor in the language of that bill. The subject of deputy marshals is covered, but it is entirely different in its provisions.

As to the point made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that the Committee on Elections did not properly have jurisdiction of this subject, that question has already been adjudicated by the reference of the bill to that committee. If the gentleman thought the reference was improper, it was his right at the time the reference was made to move a different reference; but the House having referred this bill all questions as to whether it is properly there or not have been adjudicated by the House. But independently of that, I hold that under the rule all questions relating to the election of Representatives in Congress properly should be referred to the Committee on Elections. As to the point made by the gentleman from New York, I do not think it is well taken from the fact that, under the rule, it is provided—

That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Does this provision retrench expenditures? It reduces the compensation of deputy marshals of election from $5 a day to $2 a day. It reduces their number from being unlimited to not less than two nor more than three in each district where they are required to be appointed. So in both respects, in the reduction of the number of officers and the amount of their pay, it does retrench expenditure by its terms. Then, being germane to this bill as an appropriation to supply a deficiency, which this bill in its title purports to refer to, and making that appropriation on the condition that hereafter the pay of such marshals shall be reduced in amount and they shall be reduced in the number, it comes entirely within the rule under every feature of it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I suppose these rules are not intended for a snare, and I suppose a fair and liberal construction is to be put upon them. I do not suppose, if a bill is introduced to the House and by mistake or if because the gentleman from Illinois was not carefully watched a bill was referred to his Committee on Elections over which it had no jurisdiction, the fact that it was sent there in that way would bring it within the proviso which is added to this third clause of Rule XXI. The language of the proviso is:

Provided, It shall be in order to further amend such bill on the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment.

"Having jurisdiction" under these rules. Here is a code of law for us, a code of law which is to guide us, which is to guide this House. It is in fact its chart of government. The point is whether under the rules the committee has jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Now, turn back to Rule XI, and this subdivision has special reference to Rule XI in reference to the powers of committees when it says what subjects may be considered under this proviso.

Turning back to Rule XI and the language is that—

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating—

1. To the election of members.

The rule refers to election of members of this House, not members of a future Congress. We all understand the jurisdiction of the Elections Committee. We all understand what jurisdiction it was intended to confer on that committee. And I say that the language used here, the word "jurisdiction" in this subdivision of Rule XXI, refers to the jurisdiction as it is referred to and defined in Rule XI, which confers jurisdiction upon the different committees of this House.

So far as the question of fact which has been referred to by the gentleman from Ohio on this side of the House is concerned, I do not know in reference to that; but this is the first time I have ever understood that any bill on this subject had been referred to that committee. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say this is not in substance the bill referred to the committee, or it was not a bill which would carry the jurisdiction of this amendment or of the subject-matter of this amendment to that committee; but the point which I insist upon, and the vital point here, is the language of this subdivision No. 3 of Rule XXI. It speaks with reference to the jurisdiction as it is laid down and defined in Rule XI, where the juristion and powers of the various committees of the House over subject-matters referred to them is defined, and not with reference to a jurisdiction which may be conferred by a special reference. Upon the question which the gentleman from Mississippi has discussed I shall spend no time, because under the intimation of the Chair I understand that the vital point in his mind is that I have discussed.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the important point in this case is whether the Election Committee has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of this amendment or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order turns upon that question.

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, sir; turns upon that point. I find by Rule XI that all proposed legislation on subjects relating to the election of members shall be referred to the Committee on Elections. What does that mean? This, and this only: by the Constitution this House is the "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members." In the discharge of that function this House has created a committee which it calls its Committee on Elections, and to them are referred all the questions growing out of the controversies which are involved in these particular elections.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. Rule XI, which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] has just quoted, provides that all "proposed legislation" shall be referred to the several committees thereafter named, &c., and then provides that all proposed legislation in reference to the elections of members shall be referred to the Committee on Elections. This is not a contested-election case.

Mr. ROBESON. I admit it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now if we look to the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee we find that it relates to judicial proceedings, to civil and criminal law. Should this bill, therefore, go to the Committee on the Judiciary? Not at all. It does not relate to any of the subject-matters referred to in the rule prescribing the duties of that committee and it can only go to the Committee on Elections under the rule.

Mr. ROBESON. I was about to state a general proposition, when the gentleman interrupted me, that "all proposed legislation shall be referred to committees named in the preceding rule," as follows: "Subjects relating to the election of members, to the Committee on Elections." Now my point is that that committee was organized for the consideration of the election of members after they get into this House with reference to contests in regard to their seats, and that the committee does not naturally and generally have charge of the subject-matter of the laws which regulate, and are for the future to regulate, those elections. I say that is so, first, because that committee is organized under that clause of the Constitution which gives to this House the power to which I have referred; second, because the practice has always been so; third, because all subjects relating to civil and criminal law are under this rule referred to another committee, and that division of the rule which refers subjects relating to civil and criminal law to the judiciary is the special and last provision on this subject, and takes the general subject-matter from the Committee on Elections and gives it to the Committee on the Judiciary by that direct assignment, excluding all inference of language which would take it to the Election Committee. So much for the general proposition. Since then it seems that the Committee on Elections has not generally the jurisdiction of this subject-matter.

Now, there still remains on the gentleman's side—and I wish to state it fairly—this argument: that this subject-matter has been referred to his committee by the reference of a bill on the subject which is before the committee. I say now that if my first proposition be true that generally the committee have no charge of the matter, then the special reference of that bill to them carries with it nothing but the bill and their action on it, and gives them no charge of the subject for any other purpose nor clothes them with power under this rule which belongs to another committee. Their jurisdiction is not general, but is confined to their special action on that bill alone. It is given to them subject always to the general rule of this House, and extends no further than the special reference. I do not care to detain the Chair further upon this point. I know that a suggestion of it to the distinguished gentleman who occupies the chair is sufficient to set his acute and judicial mind to the calm and full consideration and decision of the question, and I am content to rest on his decision of this matter when his mind has been once directed to it.

Therefore I will not detain the House at all upon that subject-matter. But I trust the Chair will discriminate in his ruling, if he admits this amendment, between the questions whether he admits it on the general proposition that the committee have charge, or upon the proposition that the subject-matter has been specially referred to it by the reference of the bill; because it is exceedingly important now, when these rules are crystallizing into law for the future government of this House, to let us understand whether, when this rule says that all questions relating to the civil and criminal law shall go to the committee organized for considering the laws, they are to be divided up and assigned to every committee whose mere name may suggest an analogy with the subject-matter.

Mr. CONGER. It is only because of my desire that in the first construction of these rules they shall be made to conform to their general intent, that I make any remarks at all. I think I may call the attention of the Chair to the very wide range which this question involves. I ask his attention to paragraph 32 of Rule XI. Rule XI says:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule as follows, namely: Subjects relating.

In paragraph 32 of Rule XI, where the matters within the jurisdiction of the eight committees named are stated, the chairman will see among other things that are referred to those committees on expenditures in the different Departments—the Department of State, the Treasury Department, the War, Navy, Post-Office, and Interior Departments, the Department of Justice, and on Public Buildings—the proper application of public moneys.

Now, here is a question involved in this very bill—the proper application of public moneys whether to special or to general deputy marshals. A little variation in the ruling would give to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State the whole of this question that is in dispute.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Michigan allow the Chair to suggest that the thirty-second clause of Rule XI seems to apply to investigations as to the proper application of moneys already appropriated? This amendment proposes to make a specific appropriation for the special deputy marshals.

Mr. CONGER. It is now making this appropriation, and that involves the proper application of it when made. But I have merely referred to that. I refer to another point provided for in that same clause 32, "the reduction or increase of the pay of officers." Another is "the abolishment of useless offices," which is one of the very objects of this amendment, as claimed.

Now if a member of one or the other of those committees instructed by his committee should offer an amendment in regard to the abolishment of useless offices, under the construction claimed by the gentleman from Illinois that he has the right here under the other clauses of the rule, his committee having the subject-matter of the amendment under control, that could not possibly be ruled out in my opinion; and so of several of these things. The provision is so distinct that those committees shall have charge of those particular subjects that if they report amendments here under the ruling which is asked because some matter of the election of members is involved, or the attendance of marshals at an election of members, the Chair will see how very far and how very wide such a ruling would open the door for every committee and any committee to interfere and get in amendments under that rule.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that was not at all the intention of the rule. The intention of the rule undoubtedly was that in a general deficiency bill or other appropriation bill of this kind a committee having special charge of that part of the expenditure to which the bill related might offer an amendment to it, as, for instance, the Military Committee in regard to a deficiency in the Army appropriations, the Committee on Naval Affairs in regard to a deficiency for carrying on the naval service of the country, the Committee on Foreign Affairs in regard to some expenditure in a deficiency bill making appropriations for carrying out our foreign relations. I think such a ruling can be made as shall give full scope to what I conceive to have been the object of this amendment, to permit the committees who are familiar with and understand the wants of the departments of the service, committed under the rules to their charge, to come in and say in this deficiency or in this appropriation bill—for I take it for the purpose of this discussion these are the same—for the naval service, for the military service, or for public buildings, matters committed to their examination, brought under their supervision, require in their judgment this additional appropriation to be made, and they offer their amendment as being the committee to supervise and have the jurisdiction of that subject-matter.

I have no doubt that the Chair will consider all these propositions, and I have no doubt about the correct ruling of the Chair if all the propositions are presented to his mind. My only object is that we may start right under these new rules. What I have said has been without special reference to this particular matter, but that the ruling, as the Chair has already suggested, under the new rules may be such that it shall be consistent, uniform, and capable of being maintained on principle and on a strict construction of all the rules together. It is for that reason I have ventured to call the attention of the Chair to the manner in which other committees might continually, in connection with the matters referred to them, introduce under that rule amendments and claim the right to introduce them if the construction be as claimed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KEIFER. I simply wish to add a word or two to what I have already stated. I am induced to do it by the intimation of the Chair that on one point I suggested the Chair differed from me. As has already been said, I regard the ruling on this question as a very important one, not for to-day or perhaps for this session or for this Congress, but for the future Congresses. I wish to state again what I tried to state in the first instance: that is, if the Committee on Elections had the subject-matter of this amendment referred to it by reason of the reference of the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] and if we gave that committee jurisdiction to report upon this question at all or jurisdiction to consider the question at all, then it was because the amendment itself was in substance the same as the bill.

Now I have invited the attention of the Chair to the consideration of the bill. The analysis of the amendment will show that it pertains generally to an alteration of an existing law relating to the appointment of special deputy marshals. Is not that the substance of the bill of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER?] If it is not, then the committee which this morning undertook to instruct its chairman to report an amendment to this House was doing a vain thing and one outside of its jurisdiction.

Let me repeat: if that bill gave jurisdiction to the Committee on Elections over this matter, then it was because it contained the substance of this amendment. If the amendment contains the substance of the bill, then we can come logically, I think, to the conclusion that it is not in order under the fourth clause of Rule XXI, which prohibits the introduction by way of amendment of "the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House." That is all I desire to say on this point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. One single further suggestion. The proviso of the third subdivision of Rule XXI is as follows:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Now let us look for a moment at the amendment.

For special deputy marshals of elections, the sum of $7,600.

That much I concede is germane to the bill under consideration. Let us then look at the proviso of the amendment, the vicious part of it, to which objection is made. It reads:

Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections, and general deputy marshals, for performing any duties in reference to any election, shall receive the sum of $2 per day in full for their compensation; and that all appointments of such special deputy marshals or of general deputy marshals having any duty to perform in respect to any election shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the district judge, in the absence of the circuit judge, and not less than two nor more than three appointments shall be made for any voting precinct where such appointments are required to be made, and the persons so appointed shall be of different political parties, of good character, and able to read and write the English language, and shall be well-known residents of the voting precinct in which their duties are to be performed.

That is a proposition to enact a law for the future. The point I make is that the enactment of a law regulating elections in the future, and which may run for all time, is certainly not germane to this bill under the proviso which I have read of the third subdivision of Rule XXI.

Mr. McMAHON. I am very sorry that our friends on the republican side of the House have with such unanimity interposed their points of order. After what was said yesterday by the gentlemen whom we all acknowledge upon either side to be the leader of that side of the House, I thought that a proposition to amend these election laws would be met with favor by gentlemen upon that side. But it seems now that with a great degree of unanimity they have taken the opposite tack, and now interpose a point of order upon which I propose to speak.

The committees of this House obtain jurisdiction of a bill, or of the subject-matter of a bill, either because of the nature of questions pending before them, or by the reference in open House of a particular bill to them. Now, the Committee on Elections was a very proper committee to which to refer the bill which my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] presented here as a bill pending before his committee. The second section of that bill provides that section 2021 of the Revised Statutes shall be amended by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That all applications for the appointment of special deputy marshals, as provided in this section, shall be submitted to the court, and before any appointments of such deputy marshals, or of any general deputy marshals, having any duty to perform in respect to any election, the court shall cause a notice of such application to be served on the candidates for Representatives in Congress, in the voting precinct where the appointments are to be made, representing the three different political parties casting the greatest number of votes in said precinct at the election next preceding for Representatives in Congress; and appointments of such marshals shall hereafter be made only by the court for each voting precinct where such appointments are required by law to be made, and an equal number of appointments for each voting precinct shall be made on the recommendation of each of such candidates; and each person so appointed shall be a resident of the voting precinct where his duties are to be performed.

The point I make is this: that the introduction and reference of this bill in open House without objection to the Committee on Elections gave that committee jurisdiction of the subject-matter of regulating the method of electing members of Congress. But I need not insist upon the committee having jurisdiction of the whole subject-matter. I will only insist upon its having jurisdiction according to the express terms of the bill. In the second section of the bill I find that it is proposed to amend the method of appointing special deputy marshals at elections. Therefore there can be no earthly doubt that the Committee on Elections would be authorized to report to this House any bill upon the subject-matter of either the first or the second section of that bill, because it has been referred to that committee by the House.

But getting jurisdiction of the first and second sections of this bill imposes no obligation on the Committee on Elections to report that bill back to the House in the exact shape in which it was introduced by my friend from Illinois. The very object of referring the bill to the committee was that they should consider it—should see whether it was well matured, and if not, should mature it and put it in shape.

Now, as I understand, they have considered the bill and have concluded to report in lieu of the precise bill as introduced the substance of it or something like it. They have jurisdiction to do that. They have the right to report their amendment, as they have done, because it is based upon the express provisions of a bill which was referred to them in open House without objection.

Now, let me come to the second proposition. My friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] admits that it is in order and germane upon this bill to move to appropriate $7,600 for the payment of special deputy marshals at elections. When that amendment was offered without qualification nobody raised the point of order, but we voted upon it. Now my friend from Illinois comes in and states that he is instructed by the Committee on Elections—to do what? To offer a further amendment to the pending bill. The gentleman from Illinois moves to insert $7,600 for the pay of special deputy marshals. My friend from New York admits this to be germane; but then the committee—

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, let me call attention to this language in the proviso of the rule:

Having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment being germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

Now does the gentleman claim that this amendment providing that hereafter deputy marshals shall be appointed in a particular manner—that this chapter of legislation attached to the appropriation of $7,600 is germane to the pending bill?

Mr. McMAHON. I do. I do so in all honesty and sincerity; and I will state why. In the first place, what is the character of the whole bill now pending before the House? It is a bill to provide for deficiencies in the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. If this Congress should vote this appropriation of $7,600, it will be for a supposed deficiency arising in the current fiscal year. Hence the appropriation of $7,600 is germane to the subject-matter of the bill. Now, what is under consideration in this particular clause? The pay of United States marshals and their general and special deputies. That is the question under consideration. Shall we pay them not only the fees they have earned, but those they may earn? For this appropriation is to run until the 1st day of next July.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is perfectly clear that nothing can be earned by them before that time.

Mr. McMAHON. Why not? A member of this House may die; there may be a special election ordered; the money may be needed for that purpose; and it could be used for that purpose. There is one thing which my friend has overlooked in this discussion from the beginning to the end—that this appropriation is not only for the payment of fees already earned, but for the whole fiscal year, including more than three months yet to come.

Now the amendment, being germane, proposes what? To retrench expenditures; and I suppose no gentleman on the other side of the House will for a moment contend that it does not retrench expenditures. It proposes to limit the number of deputies that may be employed at any polling place to three—

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman doubt that it will increase very largely the number of deputy marshals in places where otherwise they would not be called for?

Mr. McMAHON. It does not require them to be appointed.

Mr. CONGER. But if each party is to choose deputy marshals, will it not naturally and necessarily increase very largely the call for these officers all over the country where now they are not called for?

Mr. McMAHON. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will understand this amendment reduces the pay of these deputies from five to two dollars a day, besides providing that no more than three shall be employed at any one polling place. We know that now, not only under the law as properly construed, but under the practice, more than three may be employed.

Mr. CONGER. Not at one polling place.

Mr. McMAHON. Yes, sir; at one polling place.

Mr. CONGER. No.

Mr. McMAHON. You may employ a hundred under the present law at one polling place.

Mr. CONGER. There is no example of that kind.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, yes. There is an example of seven hundred and forty appointed in the city of New Orleans in 1876; thirty-five hundred in the State of Louisiana; and in one congressional district in Missouri, represented by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. FROST,] seven hundred and twenty deputy marshals were appointed.

Mr. McMAHON. I do not care to hinge my argument on this point of order upon the practice, I base it upon the right under the law, to appoint as many deputy marshals for a polling place as the marshal sees fit.

Now, I say that the amendment is eminently in the interest of economy because it limits the number of deputies at any one polling place to three, and reduces their pay from $5 a day to $2 a day. If my friend from Illinois had adopted the suggestion I threw out yesterday he would also have limited the number of days during which these men are to be employed. I think it a mistake that his amendment does not contain such a limitation, but in that it is liberal to gentlemen on the other side. I hope those gentlemen will withdraw their points of order and let us have something like a fair vote.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is now speaking to the merits of the amendment. I insist that he shall speak to the point of order or else that we shall have an opportunity to go into the merits.

Mr. McMAHON. I want to know, Mr. Chairman, whether it is out of order to appeal to gentlemen to withdraw their points of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to make such an appeal, but not to discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. McMAHON. I now make that appeal to every member on that side who has raised a point of order.

Mr. CONGER. And every member refuses to withdraw the point of order. I think I have the right to speak for the whole crowd. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMAHON. Where is my distinguished colleague from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD?] The "lamp" is still burning, I understand. We "vile sinners" are anxious to return.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio—

Mr. ROBESON. The lamp is still burning and the gentleman from Ohio can still come in.

Mr. McMAHON. Why does the gentleman extinguish the lamp when the sinners are ready to return?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen will save time by confining themselves to the pending point of order.

Mr. McMAHON. I have used all my efforts to get gentlemen on the other side to withdraw their point of order, and therefore now refer the matter to the Chair.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire only a moment. There is still a point of order which it seems to me has not been made. Perhaps it has been partly covered by the gentleman from New York. I do not regard this as coming within Rule XXI, or that it is material whether it retrenches expenditures or not. My point is it is foreign to the subject-matter under consideration. It introduces a new subject. This is not one of the general appropriation bills. It is a deficiency bill. A deficiency bill is to supply the funds necessary under the law of Congress as it exists, to administer the Government until the end of the fiscal year.

Here is a new subject introduced. The gentleman from Illinois proposes to change the entire system of appointing deputy marshals; to provide an entirely different system of appointment; that they shall be made by the judges of the court instead of by the marshals themselves. I invite the attention of the Chair to Rule XVI, to the latter part of clause 7, which reads "And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment." The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois introduces a new subject. It has no reference to a deficiency bill, but it proposes to change the mode of appointing deputy marshals. It is entirely different from the subject-matter under consideration. Rule XXI is not applicable, but Rule XVI is, which would exclude in this case as in any other the introduction of a matter different from that under consideration.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Chairman, I presume no gentleman who did me the honor to listen to what I had to say in the discussion on Rule XXI will pretend, for one moment, I am in favor of riders on appropriation bills; but the House, in its superior wisdom, saw fit to adopt this Rule XXI and it is upon the construction of that rule this question of order has arisen.

Now, that rule contains this proviso, "That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures."

The question is first, has the Committee on Elections jurisdiction of the subject-matter of this amendment? I contend that it has. In the first place, sir, this bill has been referred to that committee. The reference itself is an adjudication by the authority of this House of the propriety of that reference. It is an adjudication of the question of jurisdiction, and that adjudication being final, that committee has jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

Sir, it needs only the most casual reference to the terms of the bill to see that the subject-matter of the bill and the amendment is the same. "All applications for appointment of special deputy marshals, &c." In order to obviate the effect of that proposition gentlemen will have to assume the position here that the Committee on Elections is limited to the terms of the bill which is referred to it. That is not true. It is not sound parliamentary law. Having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the Committee on Elections can make such report as seems to them best on the subject; and they have accordingly instructed their chairman to report this amendment to the pending appropriation bill.

But, sir, aside from the question of reference, has not the committee jurisdiction of this question? Is it not properly referred to that committee? To return to Rule XI, we see it there provided that—

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating—

1. To the election of members: to the Committee on Elections.

Does this bill relate to the election of members? But gentlemen say that refers to contests now pending before the House. That I understand was the proposition of the gentleman from New York. Will that gentleman contend there can be any such thing as proposed legislation about a contest that is already pending? Can you propose a law about a contest before this House unless you propose an ex post facto law relating to that contest?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have seen that done.

Mr. SPEER. Well, but the gentleman will not say it was right or parliamentary. It would be highly improper to do so, and yet the gentleman is forced to that position to sustain his argument.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. SPEER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. If "proposed legislation" is to govern the Committee on Elections, then it will not have control of anything but "proposed legislation."

Mr. SPEER. Not at all.

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly, for that governs the whole subject-matter. Then how does this get before them?

Mr. SPEER. That question I am not discussing.

The logic of the gentleman's argument would be that the Committee on Elections could not decide contested-election cases at all. I say that would be the logic of it. The mistake in the gentleman's argument is that he takes the old rule as the basis of it instead of the new rule.

The old rule to which he refers is as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Committee of Elections to examine and report upon the certificates of election or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and to take into their consideration all such petitions and other matters touching elections and returns as shall or may be presented or come into question and be referred to them by the House.

That was the old rule. But the language of the new rule is:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating—

1. To the election of members.

Now, this is proposed legislation; it touches the election of members; it has been referred by an adjudication of this House to the Committee on Elections, and therefore it properly comes before the House in the manner presented by that committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, that is entirely a novel construction of that rule. We have for the first time here heard that there was to be any change whatever in the jurisdiction of the Committee on Elections. I never heard an intimation of that fact before. Now, I hold that the fact that the bill is in the hands of the Committee on Elections is by no means conclusive of its rightful jurisdiction.

If the bill upon its face shall appear to them belonging more properly to any other committee, the presumption of course is against that jurisdiction, and we must recur to the manner of the reference. If at the time of the reference, notwithstanding the apparent impropriety of that reference, the House had an understanding of the question, and referred it distinctly to this or any other committee, then we should be concluded against questioning its jurisdiction. But here we find a bill proposing to change the permanent statutes of the United States which regulate and govern the election of members of Congress, in the hands of a committee which has never from the organization of the Government had anything to do but to inquire into the certificates and manner of election of members of that particular House, whether they were rightfully or wrongfully elected—trying a personal issue between a man out and a man in. The committee never had any other jurisdiction; but the manner of electing and certifying and all that, according to the general statute, went to the hands of the Judiciary Committee.

Now, sir, I hold, therefore, the question of that committee having jurisdiction is just as much open to the Chair, on this point being raised, as it would have been open to the House when the reference was originally made. The Chair must take knowledge of the fact that thousands and thousands of bills are referred here just as rapidly as the Clerk can read and refer them, by the chance words which may happen to catch his eye on the back of the bill. If, for instance, a bill providing the ways and means for improving the navigation of the Mississippi River should happen to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, that reference in the hearing of the House would not control the question of jurisdiction. The bill belongs to the Mississippi River Committee. If a question concerning elections happens to get to the Committee on Elections it does not follow by any means that committee has jurisdiction of it. For, as I said, the committee has never concerned itself with making amendments to these general statutes, but only in deciding what I may call personal issues between men claiming seats.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Chairman, if I understand this proposition it is that a bill has been referred to the Committee on Elections by this House in accordance with its rules. I understand that committee have considered that bill, and they have reported back to the House their action in the way prescribed by the rules in the shape of an amendment to a bill now pending before this Committee of the Whole.

Now, sir, will the chairman of the Committee of the Whole undertake to decide that the House was wrong when it saw fit to refer that question to the committee? If so, it involves us in a difficulty which cannot well be remedied. This bill is referred to the Committee on Elections. It is the duty of that committee to consider and to report, and they have reported in accordance with that duty; but if you say now they did not have jurisdiction of the matter, then you deprive any committee of the power to make or propose the amendment which the Committee on Elections have deemed necessary. That committee has submitted that amendment and it was the only committee that could do it. No other committee can make it, because it is not to be presumed that the House has referred the same subject-matter to more than one committee, and having referred this subject to the Committee on Elections, it is more than probable that it will not be found before any other committee.

Now, if the report of this Committee on Elections is ruled out, the probability is, indeed it is almost certain, that the Committee of the Whole will lose whatever benefit there is in the amendment.

Now, will the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House say he will override the action of the House, and bring on this difficulty which could be avoided if we abide its action? I care not whether the reference was considerably or inconsiderately made. It does not matter. It was the action of the House; it was committed by the House; it has been reported back, and this committee must abide by it. If the chairman says the reference was improperly made, he will deprive the committee of the power of making this amendment, however anxious we might be to do it.

Will the Chair do that? Does the Chair feel that he has the authority under the rules of the House to do that? Would it not be better for the Chair to say—and I hope the Chair will not consider me as dictating what he should say, but simply as presenting my views in my own way—the House having decided, its action shall stand. It may be that if the House had taken no action, and this was an original question, the decision of the Chair would be different; but since the House has acted, with all due deference, it does occur to me the Chair is concluded by it. I feel sure the amendment ought to and will be admitted.

Mr. REED. I desire to make a suggestion upon the question of order, although it may seem to have been pretty thoroughly exhausted by what has already been said. If I understand the object of the amendment which changed the rule to its present shape, it was that the House might in all these matters of amendment have the benefit of the peculiar experience of the committees which might submit them; and therefore the House very carefully used the language which was employed in the present rule as it now stands, namely, that the amendment must be proposed, not by a committee to whom a bill in substance of the same character was referred, but by a committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

Now, I submit to the Chair that under the third and fourth clauses of Rule XXI there results this dilemma: if this be a bill in substance like the amendment which is offered, and therefore giving jurisdiction to the Elections Committee of the subject-matter, then the amendment must be obnoxious to the fourth clause of the rule. The fourth clause must rule it out as being a bill in substance like the amendment which is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman not confound the word "substance" and the word "subject-matter?" May not two bills relate to the same subject-matter and yet be very different in substance?

Mr. REED. Yes, they may; but if it be a bill which gives of itself, ipso facto, jurisdiction to the committee of the subject-matter, then it must be a bill which in substance is like the amendment, because you cannot give a committee jurisdiction by giving it power over a bill which is not in substance like this, but simply relates to the subject-matter in general. Suppose it was a bill referred to the committee which related to the business of elections and not to deputy marshals at all. In a certain broad sense that might give jurisdiction of a subject-matter relating to the election of members. But if it is claimed that jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this amendment is given by the reference of this bill, then it must be because the amendment is in substance like the bill itself. And if that is so, then it is ruled out by the fourth clause of the rule.

But what I contend is that the object of the House in establishing this rule was to guard us against amendments that were offered by committees that had no general jurisdiction of the subject; in other words, it was intended the amendment should have the sanction of a committee which by its training and its consideration generally of the subject was specially fitted to guard the House against the disasters which result from inchoate and inconsiderate legislation as placed upon appropriation bills; for I am bound in discussing this matter to suppose the democracy in offering this amendment had some good and wise reason for it. It would be parliamentary to suppose so at least.

Mr. SPRINGER. In that respect you are quite right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is anxious not to make any erroneous ruling upon these new parts of the rules, because, as has been said, such rulings may be regarded as precedents hereafter. Therefore the Chair has listened longer than he otherwise would have done to the discussion of this question.

The first part of this amendment, which proposes to make an appropriation of $7,600 to pay special deputy marshals of elections, would have been in order if offered by any individual member on the floor, because it provides for a simple deficiency and changes no existing law.

Therefore, it is the latter part of the amendment alone to which the objection seems to be urged. There are three, perhaps four, committees of the House to which this subject-matter might have been referred, not improperly, the Chair thinks. It might have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, because it relates to the courts of justice and to the proceedings in the courts. It might have been referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, because it relates to a change of part of a certain statute. It might have been referred to the Committee on Elections, as it was in fact, because it affects the manner of electing members of Congress. Or perhaps it might have been referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, because it relates to a reduction of the number and salaries of the officers who are appointed under that Department.

But the House has selected the committee to which it would refer this subject-matter, to wit, the Committee on Elections. Now, it seems that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would be assuming a very grave responsibility if he were to determine that the House had selected the wrong committee out of these four, and perhaps others, and that he would hold that the committee to which the House had referred the subject-matter had not jurisdiction over it. If the House had not acted at all, then of course it would be incumbent upon the Chair to decide according to the best of his judgment to which one of these committees this subject-matter belongs. But no such case as that is presented, and the Chair is bound to hold that the Committee on Elections has jurisdiction of the subject-matter to which this amendment relates. That presents the question whether the amendment is the same in substance as the bill which that committee has before it.

As the Chair stated a moment ago, two bills may relate to the same subject-matter and yet be very different in substance. The Chair thinks that is the case here. The subject-matter to which the bill referred to and the amendment now pending relate, is the appointment of special deputy marshals by the courts, whose duties pertain to elections for members of this House; but the provisions contained in the two are quite different. For instance, the bill contains no provision in reference to the salary of these officers. It provides that before they shall be appointed notice shall be given to the candidates for Congress, and it contains a great many other provisions upon the subject, which are not contained at all in this amendment.

The Chair therefore thinks that the Committee on Elections has jurisdiction of this subject-matter by the express order of the House, if not by the rules of the House; and that the proposed amendment is not in substance the same as the bill which has been handed to the Chair. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the Chair pass upon the other point, that the amendment is not germane to the subject-matter of the pending bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state his conclusion upon that point. By the universal practice of this House, both in the House and in the Committee of the Whole, an amendment when offered is treated as an entirety. In pursuance of this practice the Chair, but a few moments ago, was about to sustain the point of order raised against an amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE.] Thereupon the gentleman modified his amendment so as to take out of it that portion which made it subject to the point of order.

Treating the pending amendment as an entirety, the Chair is of opinion that it is germane to the bill, because, as already stated, the first part of it relates purely to a deficiency. The latter part of it is connected with the first part, inasmuch as it provides for the compensation hereafter of the same officers for whose compensation for past services provision is made in this bill. It does not, like the amendment passed upon yesterday, bring entirely new subjects before the Committee of the Whole. It brings before the committee simply an appropriation for a deficiency, and in connection with that appropriation a reduction of the number and the amount of salary of the officers for which this very appropriation is made.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then am I to understand the Chair to hold that if an amendment in one feature is germane to the subject-matter of the bill to which it is offered, and not germane in its other features, nevertheless the whole amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so decide at all. The Chair would decide without the slightest hesitation, if the latter part of this amendment had no reference whatever to the subject-matter to which the first part relates, that the whole amendment would be out of order. The Chair would not divide the amendment, but would exclude it entirely.

Mr. CONGER. As the amendment is capable of division, under the rule a separate vote may be demanded upon the different parts of this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course.

Mr. CONGER. Then I shall ask for a division of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right, the amendment containing two distinct propositions.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. KEIFER. The amendment is now debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. WEAVER. I understand that the gentleman presenting the amendment now pending will consent to have incorporated in it what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The mover of the amendment can modify it if he sees proper.

Mr. WEAVER. Then I ask the Clerk to read the modification which I understand the gentleman will accept.

The Clerk read as follows:

And when there are three or more political parties having separate tickets to be voted for at any election, three deputy marshals shall be appointed as above provided, no two of whom shall belong to the same political party.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to that, and will accept it as a part of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment as modified; and debate is now in order.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for a division of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that a division of the amendment has been called for; and the Clerk will read the first part of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For special deputy marshals of elections, the sum of $7,600.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for a separate vote on that first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to that.

Mr. McMAHON. If we vote upon the first proposition will not debate be cut off on the whole proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is offered as an entirety; but if it contains two or more distinct propositions a separate vote can be demanded upon each proposition.

Mr. McMAHON. Debate upon the amendment is now exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no debate proper upon the amendment.

Mr. McMAHON. If we proceed now to vote upon the first proposition, will debate upon the second proposition be cut off?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do I understand the Chair to hold that the vote on one branch of the amendment would cut off debate upon the second branch?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would. It is all one amendment; and if there is to be any debate upon it, it should take place before any vote is taken.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the second branch—

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will hear the gentleman's amendment; perhaps I will accept it.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is to strike out all after the words "in the absence of the circuit judge," where they occur in the last line of the RECORD print, page 39. I speak for nobody but myself, but I will vote for the amendment if all following these words be struck out.

A MEMBER. What is the effect?

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot accept that amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not ask the gentleman to accept it. This is not a contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the Committee on Appropriations has reported back this bill, recommending the adoption of an amendment making an appropriation of $600,000 to pay marshals and their general deputies. To that amendment the gentleman from Illinois has proposed an amendment. Therefore not only an amendment, but an amendment to the amendment, is now pending; and at present no further amendment is in order under the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would it be in order to offer a substitute for the whole amendment of the gentleman from Illinois?

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I offer as a substitute the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, with these modifications: inserting $5 a day instead of $2 a day, and omitting everything after the words "in the absence of the circuit judge."

The proposed substitute was read, as follows:

And for special deputy marshals of elections, the sum of $7,600: Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections and general deputy marshals, for performing any duties in reference to any election, shall receive the sum of $5 per day in full for their compensation; and that all appointments of such special deputy marshals or of general deputy marshals having any duty to perform in respect to any election shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the district judge, in the absence of the circuit judge.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the original amendment, to the amendment to the amendment, and to any possible substitute of the gentleman from Ohio. I oppose every form of recognition of these supervisors or deputy marshals. I opposed the bill by which originally these men were placed around our polls. I have seen them sometimes, when acting in conjunction with the municipal and State authorities, behave well. On the other hand, I have known occasions when, according to testimony which I cannot doubt, they have behaved ill; for instance, in the city of Philadelphia, where monstrous frauds were committed, as the evidence will show—where twenty thousand fraudulent voters were registered; while in New York—

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman's assertion in regard to Philadelphia has been utterly disproved time and again.

Mr. COX. I supposed that my friend from Philadelphia was asleep; but if he is very anxious I will read him a little chapter from the report of a committee that examined this subject fully:

At the last election in Philadelphia—

That is the election in 1876—

It appears from the testimony the registration was from twenty-five to thirty thousand excessive. In the city of Philadelphia, with a population of about eight hundred thousand, the registration of last year was over one hundred and eighty-six thousand, while in the city of New York, with a population nearly 50 per cent. greater, the registration was but one hundred and eighty-three thousand.

The fact of the excessive registration in Philadelphia becomes more apparent when it is known that over twenty thousand of the names registered were successfully attacked, and the names stricken off or marked with a red cross.

Mr. O'NEILL rose.

Mr. COX. Now let the gentleman sit down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COX. My friend from Philadelphia has never indulged in any unparliamentary conduct or language toward me. Therefore I excuse his former interruption if he will only sit down now.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will sit down until the gentleman again states something that I know not to be a fact.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has no right to interrupt me until I get through my five minutes. I will put the "red cross" on him if he does not conform to the rules. [Laughter.]

Let me read further from the same report:

And it is a matter of no little surprise that over nine-tenths of the names thus attacked in court were so attacked by democratic petitions. According to the evidence, the courts to which those petitions were returned were engaged for a month previous to the election in trying those cases alone; and but for want of time very many more names would have been stricken off, ninety petitions which had been returned not having been reached in the investigation by the courts.

This was all substantiated by testimony. But in New York—so often abused here by reckless and ignorant people, [laughter]—only fifteen hundred complaints were filed, and three hundred persons arrested. According to the testimony of Supervisor Davenport, men were frightened away from the polls by the advertisement of their names. Of the three hundred men arrested, 90 per cent. were allowed to vote as legal voters after a fair trial by the United States court. That was because in that election in New York there was, for the sake of peace and safety, an arrangement between the State, the municipal, and the Federal officers to act in concert in keeping the peace, and to have, if possible, a fair election. But in Philadelphia it was all rottenness—fair-seeming outside, but inside "full of dead men's bones." They literally voted dead men, though sometimes a dead man's vote was challenged because he had not been buried in the proper precinct!

I am only amazed and surprised to hear my friend from Philadelphia making a merit of this thing in the City of Brotherly Love. The red cross has been used by associations for better purposes, and the red-cross knight has borne his banner without shame or fraud upon other fields.

I am opposed to recognizing this Federal supervision over our elections. I voted against this bill in 1871-1872 because I knew it was unconstitutional. [Laughter on the republican side.] Ay, smile; crackle your thorns under a pot. The Supreme Court had said there was no such thing as a Federal election, only a State election; and, sir, for one I will not place the Supreme Court as now packed, partisan and demoralized, above the popular branch of the Legislature of this country. [Loud applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, on the merits of this bill which we have been considering for many days I have not undertaken to occupy a moment's time. I would not take the short time allotted to me under the rules but for the fact that I think we are again launching ourselves upon the issue which divided this House and divided the country and concentrated the interests of this country all through the extra session of this Congress.

The amendment proposed to the substitute by my distinguished colleague from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] may be entirely unobjectionable in form and in terms, but, Mr. Chairman, to me it is wholly objectionable, because it comes here in the form of a rider to an appropriation bill, and a mere deficiency bill at that. While I may feel bound to vote for it if I think it is the best we can get, especially after the Chair has ruled such an amendment is in order, yet I wish here distinctly to protest against it.

I am not particularly surprised that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] undertook to set himself up against the Supreme Court of the United States and at his undertaking, by his ipse dixit, to say, that a solemn, well, and carefully considered decision of that most august body of this country is wrong. I was not surprised to hear him say that. Mr. Chairman, I was not surprised to hear the general applause coming from that side of the House when they responded to that statement. The decision of the Supreme Court remains, however, the supreme law of the land under the Constitution.

That Supreme Court of ours he says is partisan in its character; packed is the word he uses. Who packed that court? Turn to the character of those men; read it; read the record they have made in all their life-time—each one of them—and you will see how utterly reckless and false this statement was. I might say their lives would give the lie to such a charge as that. The source of the charge need not be considered.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to say one thing further, in reference to a remark made by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] who has charge of this bill on the floor. He undertook to state to the committee a day or two ago that while the Supreme Court decided these election laws were constitutional, yet that court did not decide the law was a good one. Of course he made that statement without having read the opinion of the Court. I have not time here, in the limit allowed me, to go into that opinion. I hold it in my hand. There are some grand views stated there in the opinion of Justice Bradley, who spoke for the majority of the Court. Unless there is objection, I will insert an extract or two as part of my remarks.

The Court say in the recent case of Ex parte Seibold et al., in speaking of governmental power, that—

In exercising the power, however, we are bound to presume that Congress has done so in a judicious manner; that it has endeavored to guard as far as possible against any unnecessary interference with State laws and regulations, with the duties of State officers, or with local prejudices. It could not act at all so as to accomplish any beneficial object in preventing frauds and violence, and securing the faithful performance of duty at the elections, without providing for the presence of officers and agents to carry its regulations into effect. It is also difficult to see how it could attain these objects without imposing proper sanctions and penalties against offenders.

And in another place Justice Bradley, in the opinion, says:

Without the concurrent sovereignty referred to, the National Government would be nothing but an advisory Government. Its executive power would be absolutely nullified.

Why do we have marshals at all if they cannot physically lay their hands on persons and things in the performance of their proper duties? What functions can they perform if they cannot use force? In executing the process of the courts must they call on the nearest constable for protection? Must they rely on him to use the requisite compulsion and to keep the peace while they are soliciting and entreating the parties and bystanders to allow the law to take its course? This is the necessary consequence of the positions that are assumed. If we indulge in such impracticable views as these, and keep on refining and re-refining, we shall drive the National Government out of the United States, and relegate it to the District of Columbia, or perhaps to some foreign soil. We shall bring it back to a condition of greater helplessness than that of the old confederation.

The argument is based on a strained and impracticable view of the nature and powers of the National Government. It must execute its powers or it is no Government. It must execute them on the land as well as on the sea, on things as well as on persons. And to do this, it must necessarily have power to command obedience, preserve order, and keep the peace; and no person or power in this land has the right to resist or question its authority so long as it keeps within the bounds of its jurisdiction. Without specifying other instances in which this power to preserve order and keep the peace unquestionably exists, take the very case in hand.

Let me read a single extract more on the power of the Government and its duty:

It is argued that the preservation of peace and good order in society is not within the powers confided to the Government of the United States, but belongs exclusively to the States. Here again we are met by the theory that the Government of the United States does not rest upon the soil and territory of the country. We think that this theory is founded on an entire misconception of the nature and powers of that Government. We hold it to be an incontrovertible principle that the Government of the United States may, by means of physical force—

Note the words, gentlemen—

by means of physical force exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions that belong to it. This necessarily involves the power to command obedience to its laws, and hence the power to keep the peace to that extent.

A power that gentlemen on the other side deny—the power to keep the peace at elections, if you please, the place of all others where it should be maintained.

I might pursue this further, but I will not. It is sufficient for me to say the Supreme Court of the United States has not only said this legislation which has proved good whenever executed was constitutional but it has in effect pronounced it a good, wise, and wholesome law. This law ought to have been executed with a stronger arm and firmer hand than it has been. Now that the Supreme Court have held all these election laws to be clearly within the purview of the Constitution of the United States and that it is right in principle, it becomes our duty to appropriate money to pay for its execution, and especially is this so since a debt has been contracted on the faith of the law. The democratic party can hardly afford to persist in refusing to pay officers chosen under a constitutional act of Congress and who have in good faith performed their duty on the faith of it. No party can afford to be thus faithless to its duty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FINLEY rose.

Mr. McMAHON. Are there not three amendments pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to propose a substitute which has not been sent to the Clerk's desk in writing.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh! yes, Mr. Chairman, it has been read.

Mr. McMAHON. Then further debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand this to be a substitute. It is simply a proposition to strike out certain words in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is a substitute which I sent to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman, then, offers this as a substitute?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes.

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman offers it as a substitute and changes the compensation from two to five dollars per day.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the only change, except leaving out the last four or five lines.

Mr. COX. Is further debate in order on the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. As the gentleman from Ohio has the floor, and the gentleman from New York has already once spoken, he is not now entitled to be heard.

Mr. COX. I did not rise to debate, but to ask whether debate is in order on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted, if gentlemen are discussing the amendment. The rule allows five minutes' discussion for and five minutes against the amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. Five minutes have been exhausted against it, but not one minute in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York made a speech—

Mr. FINLEY. Against it.

The CHAIRMAN. And the gentleman from Ohio made a speech—

Mr. FINLEY. Against it, and I want to say now a few words in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair understand now, and state this proposition so that there will be no question hereafter about it. Two speeches have been made upon the substitute, and the debate now for ten minutes longer is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINLEY. Now I desire to say in the five minutes that I have a few words in reference to the marshals employed in the last presidential election. In that election there were employed 11,615 special deputy marshals, of which number 10,874 were placed in democratic precincts as shown by the report of the Attorney-General.

Now, I want to say that I am in favor of this amendment, protesting as I always have and always will against the appointment of these special marshals as a partisan outrage; protesting against a law that has been used and abused constantly for partisan purposes. I will vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois for the reason that it is a step in the direction for protecting ourselves from the outrages which we are powerless to prevent in these appointments. When I look into the report of the Attorney-General and analyze it in connection with testimony relating to the kind of men used in those precincts for partisan purposes, I feel inclined to do anything that I can by my voice and vote to procure a fair election at the polls and to procure relief from the political hummers appointed by the republican party and paid out of the Federal Treasury.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who seems to be so particularly tender whenever anything is said about the politicians of his State, passed an encomium a moment ago on some of the leading politicians there. Now, Mr. Chairman, I know nothing of the politicians of the State of Pennsylvania, excepting what I find in the newspapers. I do occasionally see something about them there—and a case in point: I find that a large number of the prominent republican politicians of that State are now under indictment for attempting to bribe and purchase the Legislature. One of these gentlemen, W. H. Kemble, president People's Bank of Philadelphia and a republican ex-treasurer of state, came into open court the other day and plead guilty to having gone into the Legislature and attempted to bribe the members.

But he talks about the marshals in his district. Why, Mr. Chairman, of the seven hundred marshals employed in Philadelphia in the last election I find, from a report of a committee of the other House, that thirteen of them were convicted of crimes, such as murder, burglary, shooting with intent to kill, &c. Two of them were keepers of houses of prostitution, two were keepers of low doggeries, and the whole lot of them, every one of them, was an active working republican at the polls who wore the badge on his breast of a special deputy marshal. [Laughter.]

I will give the gentleman the names of some of his constituents and probably he will remember them. One of them is Philip Madden. He was a special deputy marshal at the polls who had been convicted of highway robbery and served two terms in the penitentiary. [Laughter.] Francis McNamee, of the Seventh ward, had been arrested five different times for different crimes, some of them as high as burglary. Daniel Redding, who also wore the badge upon his breast, had been tried for murder, and he was the gentleman that the testimony shows had voted no less than eight times in one day. He was an active working republican and wore the marshal's badge on his breast.

Michael Slavin, marshal Fifth ward, is described as "a thief and notorious repeater." J. Roberts, marshal sixteenth division, had been a policeman in the City of Brotherly Love. He had blocked up the polls and arrested citizens who went there to vote, and he had a beautiful record. He had been keeping a house of prostitution and had there a lot of republican policemen that were paid out of the Federal Treasury for keeping the peace at the polls!

I have not time in the five minutes allowed to give a history of the savory reputations of the gentleman's constituents for whom he pleads so strongly on the floor of this House. But all the way through it was shown that the republican policemen at the polls assisted these worthy marshals to keep democrats away from the polls.

Now, under the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois there can be a mitigation of that kind of outrage in this: that instead of five hundred or six hundred republican marshals, appointed at the polls, as in some cases—for instance, one precinct in Georgia had one hundred and three, one in Missouri had several hundred—instead of that number paid out of the Federal Treasury, every one of them a republican and a partisan, we can under the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois have a decent number of decent people to attend to the duties.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I wish to say a few words in addition to what was said by my colleague in reference to the election in California, the appointing of these marshals, and the character of the men who were selected. It is scarcely necessary for me to say to this House now, after what has been in the public prints during the last few weeks, anything with reference to the nature of the disturbances there. It is hardly necessary for me to call the attention of the House to the fact that within a year past California has been the theater of a social convulsion, resulting in the adoption of a new constitution at a special election held less than a year ago, and under circumstances of peculiar interest and excitement, when political feeling ran high and the whole population from one end to the other of the State was excited on the subject.

Following immediately on that election came the campaign of the fall. Party feeling ran high, partisanship was red-hot all over the State. Charges and mutual recriminations were indulged in until at last, as you well know, it terminated in bloodshed in the very streets of San Francisco.

Under those circumstances is there any man on this floor who will tell me that there was no need of special care and prudence and a special watch over the polls? Then at this very critical juncture came the necessity for a re-registration of all our voters. The statute passed by the last Legislature required, previous to this election, a re-enrollment of all our voting population. This registration in the precincts began in the midst of all this turmoil and disturbance. Under those circumstances came the appointment of these marshals. Then followed the election; and look at the prize there was at stake. Under our new constitution every officer in the State had been deposed from office, and the ticket we voted at San Francisco was a ticket two feet in length, and containing eighty-four or eighty-five names. With a political prize like this held out you can imagine what was the inducement to fraudulent registration, and crowding men to the polls that were not entitled to come there.

It is a well-known fact that thousands and thousands of names were rejected from the poll-lists of men who endeavored to get upon the registry. After the election, the number of voters had been so large that in some of the precincts of San Francisco it took five or six days of steady work, day and night, to count the vote. These are the circumstances under which these men were appointed. It has been insinuated they were paid by the republican party. I challenge any man to offer the slightest shadow of proof for that statement. I have no hesitation in saying that the charge is absolutely false. And I will say the body of men appointed there were as honorable, upright citizens as ever did police duty in any part of the United States. I ask gentlemen before they vote against this proposition to pay these men employed to carry out the law of the United States and to preserve the peace at that critical juncture—I ask them to consider what will be the effect on the State of California if Congress refuses to give these men their just dues, earned at a juncture like that.

Mr. SIMONTON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMONTON. Is the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. One amendment may be offered to that substitute.

Mr. SIMONTON. Then I offer as an amendment to the substitute what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$5" and insert "$2;" and after the word "judge" insert "and not less than two nor more than three appointments shall be made for any voting precinct where such appointments are required to be made, and the persons so appointed shall be of different political parties; and if there are more than two political parties having tickets to be voted for, no two of said deputy marshals shall be appointed from the same party. And the persons so appointed shall be persons of good character, able to read and write the English language, and shall be well-known residents of the voting precinct in which their duties are to be performed."

Mr. CONGER. That is the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is substantially the same thing, but it is offered as an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. CONGER. Marshals of three political parties were provided for by the modification of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] and this is virtually restoring the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no doubt about that; but the Chair cannot rule it out on that account.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] now before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HERR. I desire to oppose the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to support it.

Mr. SIMONTON. I will yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Illinois, to support the amendment, after which he will recognize the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HERR.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I regret that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] should so soon have retreated from the position which he took in this House yesterday.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not retreated from it at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman says he has not retreated.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will read from the RECORD to show whether the gentleman has retreated or not. The gentleman said—

We offered last session to let the law be changed so that these officers should be appointed from the two parties. I distinctly held that out as a standing offer; and, so far as I am concerned, that "lamp still holds out to burn."

Now that gentleman comes in with a substitute and proposes to leave out the very portion of my amendment which provides that these officers shall be appointed from different political parties. Is not that true?

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I am entirely willing to put that in. I had not in the moment allowed me the time to prepare carefully the whole amendment. The part to which I objected and which I wanted to get stricken out was that part which limited us to three marshals to keep the peace in a precinct where there might be a riot of several thousand persons.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the gentleman should have moved to strike out "three" and insert "as many as the court may deem necessary."

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well, but I will not take your three-marshal proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. It seems to be difficult to frame a proposition to which the gentleman will agree.

Mr. GARFIELD. Restricting the number of marshals to three for a whole voting precinct was never a part of any proposition suggested by the other side yesterday, or accepted by us on this side. That is what I objected to.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman desired to remedy that, it was his province to move an amendment as to the number.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing to do so now.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman did not do so, but moved an amendment in regard to the manner of appointment only of these marshals.

Mr. McMAHON. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that he seems to forget that the law is not interfered with at all which permits general deputy marshals to be present at the polls; and under the statute they may be appointed to an unlimited number.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not under this amendment. This amendment limits the number to three, of general and special deputies. The point I make against the amendment as it stands is that in all cases of doubt, danger, and disturbance the Government of the United States can have but three officers empowered to keep the peace against a riot, however large.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I have no objection to leaving to the discretion of the court the power to appoint a sufficient number in each precinct to keep the peace at the polls. I desire a free and fair expression of the popular will at every poll. The democratic party desires such free and fair expressions of the people's will at every poll in the United States.

Mr. REED. It must be a recently-born desire.

Mr. SPRINGER. And any one who asserts that the democratic party desires to commit or permit fraud at any poll in the United States asserts that which is not true and which is not supported by the history of the democratic party in the past.

I ask the members of the democratic party on this floor, I ask the republicans on the other side of this House, to support this amendment, or the substance of it, in order that this vexed question of deputy marshals at the polls may be settled by this House in such manner as to give satisfaction to all the people of this country, and to take the subject out of the discussions of political parties.

We all say that we desire fair and free elections. Gentlemen on the other side must understand that it is not fair to surround the polls with an unlimited number of their own partisans, paid out of the Treasury of the United States, for the purpose of electioneering in behalf of their own party candidates. You know that is not fair. I ask you to remedy it. You can remedy it by voting for this amendment. If you do not remedy it, but contend for the right to surround all the polls with your own paid partisans in order to electioneer for your party candidates, you will be asking for that which you know is not right, and which should not be sustained by the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HERR. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take any part in this debate, and I should not do so now were it not for a peculiar feature that seems to attend this bill, as it has all similar bills since I have been a member of this House.

When my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] sought to strike down one of the old officers of this Government, he attempted to do so by attaching a rider to this bill, and seemed perfectly satisfied that his reason for doing so was complete when he could say that in Andy Johnson's time the republicans did just as mean a thing. [Laughter.] That was the very acme of his argument.

Not a rider has been put on an appropriation bill by the majority of this House that has not been defended by the democrats upon the ground that "you republicans have done just the same mean thing." And yesterday when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] who has charge of this bill sought to clinch the matter beyond all doubt, he stated as a reason why he and his party have the right to violate the law and refuse appropriations for marshals who have done their duty, "you republicans once violated law; you did not enforce the fugitive-slave law." So it has ever been. It seems that the highest idea of legislation that democrats can get is to try to imitate the meanest measures we republicans have ever passed. [Laughter.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, it would be refreshing to me to have these gentlemen introduce one bill here upon which they could stand up and say before the House, "we are in favor of this bill because it is right, because the interests of the country demand it," and not have to resort to the argument that in some unguarded moment the republican party had done something just as bad. Has it come to this, that the democratic party of this country has no higher idea of legislation than to follow and imitate our mistakes? Is it true that the meanest things we have ever done seem to a democrat to be directly in the line of retrenchment and reform? [Great laughter.]

Mr. WARNER rose and attempted to interrupt.

Mr. HERR. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not interrupt me, for he has the ability to speak longer and oftener on any subject without exhausting either the subject or himself than any man I ever saw. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, there are before the country great questions that this Congress ought to be at work upon. We have been here three months and a half and only a single general appropriation bill has been reached. Our river and harbor bill still sleeps in committee. The great question, what shall be done with the Indian tribes and their reservations, is still unsolved. The question of interstate commerce, which has agitated this country from end to end, is still unsettled. Our friend from New York [Mr. WOOD] has in his charge undisposed of one of the most important financial measures yet introduced into this Congress. I refer, sir, to the funding bill; and I say to the gentlemen who live on the seaboard, "You ought to be here with some measure that the men from the West, who are not familiar with the subject, can support, providing for the restoration of our commerce to the oceans of the world." But nothing of the kind has yet been proposed.

Yet, sir, with all these questions and many others demanding immediate attention, we cannot have presented here a little bill to make up deficiencies without a week being frittered away on this kind of profitless discussion. I say, Mr. Chairman, it is time that this Congress should go to work and do some of the business for which we were sent here.

I should leave this subject right here but for a "sneer" which fell from the lips of our democratic friend from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] in reference to the "bloody shirt." I was sorry to hear him refer to that. The effect was not great. I have heard that sneer before. It is twenty years old. I was in Ohio during the war and well remember how the party he represents was in the habit of sneering at that same shirt when the blood on it was yet fresh and new, and when it was the only winding-sheet of so many of the brave soldiers who went down to death that the nation might live, and these same gentlemen have been sneering at this "bloody shirt" from that time until now.

Mr. WEAVER. Did the gentleman get any farther south than Ohio?

Mr. HERR. No, sir; I was not in the service. Mr. Chairman, unfortunately, Ohio had so many rascally copperheads within her borders at that time that she was compelled to keep some of her best men at home to take care of those fellows in the rear. [Great laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Cries all over the House: "Go on!" "Go on!"

Mr. HERR. No, gentlemen; I will take no more time.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman from Michigan is exhausted; now let us have a vote.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Till one of the proposed amendments is disposed of, no further amendment is in order. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The gentleman from Ohio has modified his substitute as the Clerk will read.

Mr. SIMONTON. Has the gentleman the right to modify his substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. He has; but, as the Chair now understands, he does not propose to do so.

Mr. SIMONTON. If the gentleman modifies his substitute, I desire a like privilege with reference to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Any gentleman offering an amendment has a right to modify it before a vote is taken.

Mr. SIMONTON. If the gentleman from Ohio proposes to modify his proposition, I would like to modify my amendment, so that it may come in properly in connection with his.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has made no modification in his amendment, although at one time he proposed to do so.

Mr. EWING. I hope my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] will be permitted to make such modification as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a perfect right to modify the substitute if he wishes to do so.

Mr. EWING. He can have unanimous consent if necessary, as he seems to be anxious to have non-partisan deputy marshals.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have written out a modification in the form of an additional clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

For special deputy marshals of elections, the sum of $7,600: Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections and general deputy marshals, for performing any duties in reference to any election, shall receive the sum of $5 per day in full for their compensation; and that all appointments of such special deputy marshals or of general deputy marshals having any duty to perform in respect to any election shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the district judge in the absence of the circuit judge; said special deputies to be appointed in equal numbers from the different political parties.

Mr. GARFIELD. I modify the substitute further by striking out the words "and general deputy marshals," as the amendment ought to relate to special deputies only.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to that modification.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to modify his own substitute.

Mr. FIELD. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to one point. The provision is that in the absence of the circuit judge these officers shall be appointed by the district judge.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FIELD. I suggest that the words "of the district" be inserted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I modify the amendment further by inserting after "district judge" the words "of the district."

The amendment of Mr. SIMONTON to the substitute of Mr. GARFIELD was read, as follows:

Strike out "$5" and insert "$2;" and after the word "judge" insert:

And not less than two nor more than three appointments shall be made for any voting precinct where appointments are required to be made; and the persons so appointed shall be of different political parties; and if there are more than two political parties having tickets to be voted for, no two of said deputy marshals shall be appointed from the same party. And the persons so appointed shall be persons of good character, able to read and write the English language, and shall be well-known residents of the voting precinct in which their duties are to be performed.

Mr. KEIFER. I should like if we are going to vote on the amendment of my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] to have the Clerk read that substitute as it would be if adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. That has just been done.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the Clerk to read what is to be stricken out of the original amendment; but I should like to have the amendment read as it will be if adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio as it now stands, and the Chair asks that gentleman to observe whether the changes have been made according to his desire.

The amendment was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee to modify his amendment so as to make it come in at the end of the substitute as originally offered.

Mr. SIMONTON. Before the word "said" and after the word "judge."

The question recurred on Mr. SIMONTON's amendment to Mr. GARFIELD's substitute.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 105, noes 103.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. SIMONTON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 117, noes 114.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to restore the words "and general deputy marshals having any duty to perform at any election," wherever they occur in the original text. I desire the general deputy marshals having any duty to perform at any election shall be subject to the same appointment as special deputy marshals and limited to the same number.

Mr. GARFIELD. You cannot change it now.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. What is the difference between general and special deputy marshals?

Mr. SPRINGER. These general deputies are to perform their duty over the whole State. Now at the last election in the State of South Carolina several hundred deputy marshals were appointed who went into all parts of the State and raided around for the pretended purpose of enforcing these laws. I desire those general deputy marshals shall be subject to the same appointment as special marshals and in the same number. I desire to restore those words, therefore.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then is on the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINLEY. Let us have that substitute, as amended, read.

Mr. GARFIELD's substitute, as amended, was then read.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for a division on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. On what?

Mr. CONGER. First on the proposition to appropriate $7,600.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the question now before the committee. The question before the committee is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois to insert the words "general deputy marshals" in this amendment which has just been read.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois the effect of conferring on the judge the power to appoint general deputy marshals is simply to take it from marshals in all cases.

Mr. SPRINGER. Where it speaks of general deputies having any duty to perform at any election in the State.

Mr. HISCOCK. The duty the general marshal would have to perform would be in the execution of process. When it comes down to the question of supervising elections, he is not charged with the same duties as the marshal himself. From that fact of executing process he becomes a deputy marshal.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will put in words prohibiting general deputies having any duties to perform in reference to elections, very well.

Mr. KEIFER. Have they now?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have understood that in 1876 in the State of South Carolina, all over that State, general deputies were appointed to go into precincts where under law special deputies could not go.

Mr. HISCOCK. General deputies have power to execute process, and they may be called upon to preserve the peace; but as general deputies they have no power whatever over elections.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood it was construed differently. It will do no harm, however, to put it in.

Mr. HISCOCK. The effect of the amendment will be to change the appointing power of deputy marshals.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it open to the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been under discussion for ten minutes and the point of order comes too late.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 98, noes 64.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4924) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 4376) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 637) granting an increase of pension to Lucien Kilbourn; and

An act (S. No. 1281) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to introduce cotton cordage into the naval service of the United States.

The message also transmitted for the consideration of the House a letter of the Secretary of War in reference to Mobile Bay.

REVISED RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to submit the following report amending the rules of the House, and ask that the same be printed in the RECORD, and also in the usual form. I also give notice that I will call the same up to-morrow for action.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Rules ask leave to report certain amendments to the rules made necessary by a clerical and sundry typographical errors, and also by reason of amendments made in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the report of the Committee on Rules submitting "revised rules," which amendments were not at the time supplemented by other amendments making other rules conform to and in harmony with such amended rules.

The amendments proposed are as follows:

After the words "select committee," in line 3 of clause 2, Rule XIII, insert the following words:

"The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the House Calendar, or the Committee of the Whole House, according to its character."

Strike out the word "ordered," in line 2, clause 1, Rule XVII, and insert in lieu thereof the word "seconded."

After the word "debate," in line 3, clause 1, Rule XVII, insert the following words:

"Except the hour authorized in clause 3, Rule XIV."

After the word "submit," in line 12, of same clause and rule, strike out the letter "a" and insert the word "one."

After the word "instructions," in line 16, same clause and rule, insert the words "and without debate."

After the word "names," in line 2, clause 1, Rule XXII, strike out the words "and the reference or disposition to be made thereof," and insert in lieu thereof the words "thereon, and the same shall be referred to the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter thereof."

After the word "propositions," in line 1, clause 3, Rule XXIII, insert the words "directly or indirectly;" and after the word "people," in line 2, of same clause and rule, strike out the semicolon and insert in lieu thereof a comma.

In clause 1, Rule XXIV, line 7, after the word "only," insert the words "House resolutions and;" and in line 9, of same clause, after the word "resolutions," insert the words "of inquiry."

Strike out all after the word "Union," in line 4, clause 6, Rule XXIV.

Add to Rule XXXIV, after the word "consent," the following proviso:

"Provided, That the persons embraced in clause 2, Rule XXXVI, shall be admitted to the marble-room on the south of the Hall of the House under such regulations as the Committee on Rules may from time to time prescribe."

POST-OFFICE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies for the Post-Office Department. I do not remember exactly the number of the bill, and ask that the Senate amendments thereto be printed, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House adjourn.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MONEY, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, by unanimous consent, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5256) to establish post-routes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to notify the House that I shall call up for consideration to-morrow morning the deficiency appropriation bill and move to suspend private business for the purpose of considering it.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, the papers in the case of Nathaniel G. Smith, previously referred to the Committee on Claims, were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

TRANSPORTATION OF UNITED STATES MAILS.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting the report of all fines imposed upon and deductions made from the pay of contractors for transporting the mails of the United States for the years 1875, 1876, and 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relating to an investigation respecting certain lands in Washington City belonging to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

And then, on motion of Mr. CONGER, (at four o'clock and thirty-six minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

By Mr. WILLIAM ALDRICH: The petition of Marder, Luse & Co., type-founders, of Chicago; Illinois, against the abolition of the duty on type—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of James W. Stone and 40 others, soldiers of the United States Army, engaged in the late war, for the early passage of a law providing for the payment of the difference between the value of greenbacks, in which they were paid for their services, and the value of gold at the time of payment—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BARBER: The petition of Dr. W. S. Pearce, of Waukegan, Illinois, for the removal of the stamp-tax on perfumery, cosmetics, and proprietary medicines—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BAYNE: The petition of George S. Hays and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, that Congress grant lands to actual settlers under the homestead laws and provide sufficient money for an outfit, to be secured by mortgage to the United States—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BENNETT: The petition of 68 citizens of Northern Dakota, that the bill organizing the Territory of Pembina be amended by changing the name to North or Northern Dakota, and when so amended that it pass—to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, the petition of 110 citizens of Northern Dakota, of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. BICKNELL: The petition of Charles L. Hoover and 19 others, druggists and manufacturers of medicines in New Albany, Indiana, for the removal of the stamp-tax on perfumery, cosmetics, and proprietary medicines—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BOUCK: The petition of G. K. Whitney and others, of Winnebago County, Wisconsin, soldiers of the United States Army, engaged in the late war, for the early passage of a law providing for the payment of the difference between the value of greenbacks, in which they were paid for their services, and the value of gold at the time of payment—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BREWER: A paper relating to the pension claim of John Bartow—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BRIGHAM: The petition of printers, publishers, and others, of New York and elsewhere, against the removal of the tariff upon type—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CABELL: The petition of P. Bouldin, A. Anderson, and R. H. Glass & Son, of Danville, Virginia, that materials used in making paper be placed on the free list, and for a reduction of the duty on printing-paper—to the same committee.

By Mr. CALKINS: The petition of S. E. Douglass, of Porter County, Indiana, for the removal of the stamp-tax on perfumery, cosmetics, and proprietary medicines—to the same committee.

By Mr. CONGER: The petition of H. C. Knill, of Port Huron, Michigan, of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. CONVERSE: The petition of C. Hills and 38 others, citizens of Delaware County, Ohio, that the patent laws be so amended as to make the manufacturer or vendor of patented articles alone responsible for infringement—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petitions of Joseph Carman and 21 others, and of A. B. Elliott and 120 others, citizens of Fayette County, and of A. J. Case and 37 others, citizens of Delaware County, Ohio, for a law to prevent fluctuations and unjust discriminations in freights—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. COVERT: The petition of the National Association of Bleachers and Dyers, for removal of the duty on chrome iron ore and bichromate of potash—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. COX: The petitions of Thiteheuer & Glastaeter and other printers, publishers, stereotypers, and type-founders, of New York City, and of the employes of Farmer, Little & Co., of New York City, against the reduction or abolition of the tariff duty on type—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of the publishers of the Eco d'Italia, New York City, for the abolition of the duty on type—to the same committee.

By Mr. DICK: The petition of Seth Hoagland and 10 others, citizens of Mercer County, Pennsylvania, that the Agricultural Department be made a Cabinet bureau—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, the petitions of E. Jewell and 15 others; of J. L. Moore and 8 others, and of W. D. Burnett and 28 others, citizens of Mercer County, Pennsylvania, against discriminations by railroads—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petitions of Nelson Boylan and 29 others; of Thomas Bagnall and 7 others, and of E. Jewell and 14 others, citizens of Mercer County, Pennsylvania, that the patent laws be so amended as to make the manufacturer or vendor of patented articles alone responsible for infringement—to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of W. C. Wygant and 33 others, soldiers of Crawford County, Pennsylvania, for the passage of the Weaver soldier bill—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DICKEY: The petition of L. Evansline and 106 others, citizens of Clermont County, Ohio, of similar import—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Maddox, Hobart & Co., of Cincinnati, and 9 other distillers and rectifiers, of Ohio, against certain provisions of the bill to amend the revenue laws relating to distilled spirits—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. EVINS: The petitions of P. H. Riley, of Edward Bailey, and of A. M. Howell, of Glenville, and of L. M. Grist, of the Enquirer, Yorkville, South Carolina, for the abolition of the duty on type—to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 19, 1880.

Prayer by Rev. A. W. PITZER, D. D., of the city of Washington. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief of Engineers, covering a report of Major W. H. H. Benyaurd, Corps of Engineers, upon a survey and proposed improvement of the mouth of Red River, Louisiana, with four maps showing the present and former conditions of the navigation in that locality; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, certified copies of patents issued to Indian tribes in the Indian Territory and of applications for lands in that Territory by railroad companies or corporations, and the action thereon by his Department; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Commissary-General of Subsistence, representing the absolute need of six clerks in his office in addition to those estimated for, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, to effect the disposal of claims now on file in a reasonable time, should Congress not establish some tribunal to which they can be referred for settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in connection with the report of Captain A. N. Damrell, Corps of Engineers, upon the survey of the harbor of Mobile, transmitted on the 13th instant, a communication of the Chief of Engineers, covering a report with accompanying map from the Board of Engineers for river and harbor improvement, to which the report of Captain Damrell was referred for consideration; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Mrs. Dora Stark, wife of Theodore O. Stark, formerly Dora Lambeth, and Fanny Lambeth Randolph, widow, formerly Fanny Lambeth, surviving heirs of the estate of W. M. Lambeth, both residents of the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, praying that their claim against the United States for property taken during the late war be referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the petition of Susan B. Anthony, praying for relief from political disabilities. The petitioner complains that while Congress has passed many acts for relieving men from political disabilities, it has not passed any act for relieving a woman from her political disabilities. She asks that the same attention be paid to her petition as though her name were Samuel, instead of Susan. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, presented a petition of citizens of Marion County, Florida, praying for the deepening of the entrance to Cumberland Sound to the depth of twenty-one feet at low-water; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCPHERSON presented the petition of the National Association of Bleachers and Dyers, Moses Pierce president, praying for a reduction of the prohibitory duties on bichromate of potash; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 915) for the relief of Edgar Huson, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 826) for the relief of several persons impressed into the United States naval service, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petition of Mrs. Britania W. Kennon, widow of Commodore Beverly Kennon, praying an increase of pension, and the bill (S. No. 871) granting a pension to Mary W. Jones, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report a bill for a public act to cover these and similar cases.

The bill (S. No. 1501) to restore pensions in certain cases was read twice by its title.

REPORT OF ENTOMOLOGICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution for printing six thousand extra copies of Bulletin No. 5 of the United States entomological commission, to report it favorably with an amendment striking out the words, "the House of Representatives concurring." The cost being less than $500 it can be a Senate resolution simply. I ask its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed, with necessary illustrations, at the Government Printing Office, 6,000 extra copies of Bulletin No. 5 of the United States entomological commission on the subject of the chinch-bug; 3,000 copies for the use of the House, 2,000 for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Printing, striking out the words "the House of Representatives concurring."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1502) for the relief of certain pre-emptors in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SLATER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1503) authorizing the Legislature of the State of Oregon to provide for the completion of the Oregon and California Railroad; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1504) refunding to the University of Notre Dame du Lac, of Saint Joseph County, in the State of Indiana, the sum of $2,334.07 in gold coin, that being the amount paid on certain imported articles, &c.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COKE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1505) for the disposition of certain stocks, and accrued interest thereon, belonging to the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians, temporarily invested for their benefit under authority of act of Congress approved March 3, 1875; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1506) to authorize persons who have entered homesteads on the public lands which have been abandoned or for any reason canceled to make a new entry, also to require mistakes of description in making homestead entries to be corrected; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1507) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the united Peorias and Miamies of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1508) for an appropriation of money to close the slough at the confluence of the Minnesota and Mississippi Rivers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 95) providing for the ascertainment and payment of the claim of the legal representatives of Walter H. Stevens, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WHYTE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Mary Good be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Thomas B. Wallace be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar of General Orders, commencing at the point reached yesterday.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill (H. R. No. 2518) for the relief of Nelson Lyon and Jeremiah S. James.

Mr. BAILEY. The bill (S. No. 1282) to incorporate the National Educational Association, reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] from the Committee on Education and Labor, was considered yesterday morning and the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] objected to it. I think with some amendments proposed the bill will not be objectionable to any Senator. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments I propose may be read. I think they will satisfy every Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was passed over without prejudice and comes up as a matter of right this morning.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1282) to incorporate the National Educational Association.

Mr. BAILEY. In section 1, line 26, after the word "associates," I move to strike out the words "the officers and members of the association known as The National Educational Association."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is one proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] which will be reported.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw the amendment he proposed.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. How is this the first bill on the Calendar?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the first bill on the Calendar this morning. It was passed over without prejudice yesterday. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.]

Mr. GORDON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no objection to the motion but the Senator from Georgia will notice that the Senators from Arkansas who have charge of the unfinished business are not present at this moment.

Mr. GORDON. I withdraw the motion temporarily.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will ask the Senator from Georgia whether the Senators from Arkansas have been consulted in regard to an executive session at this time?

Mr. GORDON. I am satisfied they would consent to a short executive session. I do not think it will require a very long one; but I will wait until the Senators from Arkansas come in.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. COCKRELL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is agreed to.

TITLES AT HOT SPRINGS.

Mr. GORDON. After consultation with my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] I suggest that if the Senate will consent to take up the Hot Springs bill and proceed with it at once instead of using the time on the Calendar, I shall be very glad to have that matter go on, and then I will move at the end of that for an executive session. I move therefore to lay aside the Calendar of Pending Orders, and proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. GARLAND. I will state in support of that motion that I am satisfied we can finish the Hot Springs bill in half an hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, shall the pending order be laid aside for the purpose of moving that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the Hot Springs bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4244) for the establishment of titles in Hot Springs, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert a substitute.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move to strike out from section 1 to section 8, inclusive, of the substitute reported by the Committee on Public Lands. The first section simply authorizes these proceedings to be transmitted to the officers at Little Rock. That is being done by the Secretary of the Interior now. The other sections that I have moved to strike out really authorize a new trial of the adjudications of the Hot Springs commission in the Court of Claims.

Although, I think, as a general proposition, there ought to be an appeal in all cases, yet it ought to have been provided for by the law that created the commission, if it was to be allowed. This has not been done. We know of but very few complaints in that direction. The proceedings of the commission have been approved as a general thing. There are said to be a few persons who are not satisfied. It would be astonishing, owing to the infirmity of men, if the commissioners had not made some mistakes. All bodies make mistakes, no matter whether they are lawyers or laymen.

Mr. WHYTE. Or judges.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Or judges, as my friend from Maryland very appropriately says. I am satisfied that this provision for a review should be stricken out. When it is ascertained that a review can be had in the Court of Claims, this matter of the Hot Springs will not be ended for years; and I believe it is for the interest of the people there and for the interest of the United States that the litigation should be settled and ended. The commissioners have decided who are entitled to purchase lands and who are not.

I therefore move to strike out those sections. There would then remain but two general provisions in the bill of any importance. One is that the purchase-price of these lots shall be reduced 50 per cent.; the other is that the certificates which were issued for condemned property, amounting to $74,000, shall be received as money in the purchase of these lots. I am satisfied that the Government does not want to make money out of the Hot Springs reservation. The payment of the large assessment is I think uncalled for. The bill as it passed the House put the price at $10 an acre. The Committee on Public Lands of the Senate have fixed the amount at a reduction of 50 per cent. on the commissioners' valuation.

I move to strike out all the sections of the committee's amendment from 1 to 8, inclusive.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to strike out from the substitute reported by the Committee on Public Lands the first eight sections.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to utter but a word. We have said all that we care to say in reference to this matter; the Senate is in possession of the whole case; we thought it best to give these parties a review; but if the Senate after having heard the discussion, disinterested as they are, consider it best to strike out those sections, we have nothing to say.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I presume that renders necessary certain amendments in section 9.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator offers those amendments, will he be kind enough to tell me whether the substitute as now amended gives any recourse to those who complain of hardship under the past adjudication?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. None at all. It receives the adjudication of the board as final. There are but very few cases of complaint with it.

Mr. CONKLING. I ought to say to the Senator that of the communications which have come to me on this subject, and there have been a number, none have been so earnest, none have complained so bitterly of anything as of cases of individual hardship growing out of what has already been done. I ought rather to have said this before the vote was taken; I did not; therefore I venture to say so to the Senator now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] who reported the bill will move certain amendments rendered necessary by the amendment just agreed to.

Mr. WALKER. Eight sections of the substitute reported having been stricken out, it becomes necessary that it should be further amended. I move in line 2 of section 9, after the words "in whose favor," to strike out the words "said commissioners or the said court of claims shall have finally adjudicated," and insert the words "the commissioners appointed under the acts of Congress of 1877 and 1878 relative to the Hot Springs of Arkansas have adjudicated;" so as to read:

That any person, his heirs or legal representatives, in whose favor the commissioners appointed under the acts of Congress of 1877 and 1878 relative to the Hot Springs of Arkansas have adjudicated, shall have the sole right to enter and pay for the amount of land the commissioners may have adjudged him entitled to purchase within twelve months next after the expiration of the thirty days' notice, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER. In line 6 of section 9, after the words "expiration of the," I move to strike out the words "thirty days' notice by the land officers required in section 1 to be given, in cases where no proceedings are had in the said Court of Claims, and in cases where proceedings are had in said court, within six months after the adjudication of said Court of Claims, and the issuance to such person of the certificate by the clerk of said court hereinafter provided for," and insert the words "twenty days' notice required by the tenth section of the act of Congress of March 3, 1877, to be given."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would suggest to make it read simply "at the expiration of the notice," without saying "twenty days."

Mr. WALKER. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER. In section 10, line 9, after the words "or clerk thereof," I move to strike out the words "shall vest in the assignee the right to make such purchase and entry therewith," and to insert "the land officers in like manner shall receive them from the assignee in payment of lands purchased by himself or others;" so as to read:

And that such certificates be assignable, and when assigned in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, or the execution of the assignment thereof shall have been acknowledged before a court of record or clerk thereof, the land officers in like manner shall receive them from the assignee in payment of lands purchased by himself or others.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER. At the end of section 10, I move to add:

And in all cases where such certificates are issued the register of the land office shall certify on the original certificate taken up the number of lots purchased therewith and the price thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. In section 13 the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] yesterday objected to this phraseology:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to designate as many as six lots from the unwarded grounds on the Hot Springs reservation for the use of the common schools of the corporation of the town of Hot Springs.

I move to strike out the words to which he objected, "as many as," so as to make it read, "to designate six lots."

Mr. McDONALD and Mr. WALKER. Say "not exceeding six lots." Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I think it would be best to have it read, "designate six lots."

Mr. McDONALD. That number may not be necessary.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is necessary. It strikes me we had better say "six lots."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the phraseology agreed upon? Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move to strike out the words "as many as," so as to read, "to designate six lots." Certainly six lots are needed for public schools in a town of the present and prospective size of Hot Springs.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to move an amendment to section 13 of the substitute reported by the committee. At the end of section 13 I move to add:

The Secretary of the Interior is also authorized to convey to the Baptist church of Hot Springs, whose church edifice was destroyed by fire, a suitable lot of ground, not exceeding one-eighth of an acre, from that portion of the Hot Springs reservation laid off into lots and blocks and forming part of the town site, but not awarded to any claimant and not otherwise disposed of by this act; said conveyance to be on consideration of the payment of a sum equal to $10 per acre for said lot.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is a formal amendment necessary to section 15 that I should like to have made. It says:

Any money paid in under section 9 of this act.

Of course it ought to be section 1 of this act now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That amendment will be made. The numbering of the sections will be changed of course to correspond. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands as a substitute for the bill as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know that I ought to interfere in this matter. If the Senators from Arkansas, who are directly interested in it, are satisfied, perhaps I ought not to object; but I understand there are very serious complaints made by people who claim to have rights in this land of great hardship that has been done to them by the action of the commission. It does seem to me that the sections stricken out were really valuable sections and ought to have been left in the bill. They certainly could work no great hardship. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] says the result of them will be to continue the controversy. It ought to be continued until it is properly settled and these people get their rights. It will not continue it any longer in Congress. I doubt whether this will be the final end of it in Congress. I presume it will appear here at every session for a number of years yet. It has been here ever since I have been in the Senate.

I do not believe the objections are well founded to the sections that allow a review in this case. I do not know anything about it personally, but I have a general knowledge that there is a great deal of complaint; and the whole trouble in this case in my judgment arises from the United States Government attempting to set apart a piece of land and control it because it has a spring on it. The entire principle is wrong; and we should have saved a good deal of money and a great deal of time, and the people of that section would have been infinitely better off, if the Government had allowed the first man that got there to take it. That ought to be the rule in reference to valuable springs or valuable lands. The man who has the enterprise to go and put his claim on the land in accordance with law ought to take it. But that has not been done. Here are people who have gone there, built houses on this ground, laid claim to the ground or alleged a right to take it at a moderate rate, and they say the commission have misjudged their rights. It does seem to me that it is but fair to allow an appeal or a review by certiorari. There can be no wrong done to anybody by it; there may be great wrong if it is not allowed. Of course, if the Senators from that State think justice will be done by the bill as it is, I shall not make any particular objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. McDONALD. If the bill passes without the provision for a review I have no doubt it will substantially meet the case. The claimants will be willing to take the land at the price here fixed—one-half the actual value as appraised by the commissioners. If there are any errors in the decision of the commissioners, this bill of course does not cut off entirely the people aggrieved. While we leave the question of further controversy open, as a matter of course we shall have controversy and litigation; but if it is understood that this is to be regarded as substantially a final adjustment, it will be so, because I am satisfied there has been no very great injustice done by the commissioners in their action. While we thought it better in committee to allow a review, it has been decided by the Senate to pass the bill in the form it is now amended. Probably the shortest way is to let the bill pass as it now stands.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator from Indiana why the committee reported those sections giving an opportunity to correct errors?

Mr. McDONALD. I have already stated that there were some complaints made before us by parties that the awards had not been in all respects right and just, and we thought it right to give them a chance to have the matter reviewed.

I will state further that these complaints are not of such a character as in my judgment should prevent this from being a finality if the Senate see proper to rest it where it will rest if the bill pass in the present form. On the other hand, if any of these parties shall still come forward with complaints, it may be in the power of Congress to do something for them hereafter if they present a good case. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said yesterday that the legislation of 1877 was intended to be a finality.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana how he can say that this matter can come here again? This, as I understand, is the complaint on the part of these people that the commissioners have misunderstood their rights. Now, by this bill the land passes absolutely to somebody, the commissioners having adjudged it perhaps to the wrong persons. How can these men come here unless they come and seek a moneyed consideration at the hands of Congress? How can they be set right if they have been wronged by the commissioners?

Mr. McDONALD. I will state to the Senator one way in which I think it may be done. If parties do not accept these awards, if they do not take their title under this bill in case it becomes a law, I do not see anything to prevent them from coming forward and specifically setting forth their claims. That has not been done now. If, on the other hand, they do accept this as a finality, then as a matter of course as to all who do thus accept it the case is closed; they become the owners of the property on the terms provided in this bill. But if they do not see proper to take it, if they have been so wronged that the provisions of this bill and the terms of it impose injustice on them, they will find a way of letting us know it. If their claims have not been properly regarded by the Hot Springs commission, as a matter of course they will not accept this provision, and they will be here again with their clamor.

Mr. TELLER. I do not understand that these complaints are made by people who say that the Government is getting something, but there is a controversy between occupying parties. There is where the trouble comes in. That is the complaint I have heard more about than anything else, that the commissioners misjudged the rights of the parties who are occupying. But, as I said before, if the Senators who have more knowledge on this subject than I have are satisfied, I shall not interpose.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, having been on the ground covered by this bill about two years ago when the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] who spoke yesterday was there, I know something about the value of this property, and I think, in response to what the Senator from Colorado has said, that the people of Hot Springs ought to be very well contented with the provisions of this bill, as amended by the Senator from Illinois. I understand that the commissioners have appraised property there at the value of $223,000, which it is proposed to reduce 50 per cent., making the amount that is to be paid to the United States Government $111,000. From my knowledge of that property, I venture to say that there can be a thousand men found in this country who would be glad to give a million dollars in cash for what we propose to sell for $111,000. I have no doubt about it.

But there is one other point that I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to, and that is this: While I think the United States Government ought not to be a speculator upon this property, and that it ought not to seek to make money out of it, I am convinced that the Government ought not to lose anything by this disposition of the property. I understood yesterday by the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas who had the bill specially in charge that there were condemned property certificates amounting to about seventy-four or seventy-five thousand dollars. The expenses of administering this trust, as the same Senator said, have been about $75,000 more, making an aggregate of $150,000. Now, as these property certificates are to be received as money in the payment of this assessed valuation, which is $111,000, there is a deficit of about $45,000 upon the showing the Senators themselves have made.

Mr. McDONALD. That deficit is made up and more than made up by the receipts the Government has already drawn from that source.

Mr. INGALLS. Of what do those consist?

Mr. McDONALD. I do not know exactly the various items.

Mr. WALKER. The amount of the assessed value of the property is two hundred and twenty-three thousand and odd dollars. The half of that is $111,500. The cost of the commission is $72,000 and over. The condemned property is seventy-four thousand six hundred and odd dollars. There has been a sale of condemned property to the amount of $1,800, which the Government has received. In addition to that, I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that in 1876, under the order of the Court of Claims, a receiver was appointed who received $46,000 in rents from these people. When you put together the $111,500, the $1,800 of condemned property, and the rents collected after paying all the expenses of the receivership, about $36,000, we find that there is still a balance coming to the Government upon the basis that we lay down in this bill. I hope the Senator understands it that in addition to this amount to be paid in for the property, $111,500, $46,000 has been taken from these people, and in addition to that the Government retains thirty thousand five hundred dollars' worth of condemned property—the Arlington Hotel and the bath houses erected there.

Mr. INGALLS. Of course the Senator does not intend to have it understood that this $46,000 of rents was taken out of the people. If it had not been paid to the Government it would have been paid to somebody else.

Mr. McDONALD. It was revenue derived by the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. But that of course is diminished by the expense of administering that trust, whatever it was. There must have been some expense.

Mr. WALKER. We take out the expenses of administering the trust, $36,000, and still there is a balance left.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator of course will understand that I am not opposing the bill, for I am in favor of its passage; but I think those who are insisting that this is any hardship on the people of Hot Springs are not talking strictly in accordance with the facts, for I am advised that in many cases since this has been settled, lots that had been appraised at $400 have already been sold as high as $4,000, and in several instances where lots have been appraised at small valuation, they have been leased at a larger rent per annum than the assessed value of the property. If they get the assessed valuation reduced 50 per cent., it appears to me there ought to be no complaint about the amount they are called upon to pay nor any special solicitude about obtaining the right of review.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas the Government by this bill will receive, in addition to what she has already received in the way of rentals, all that she has expended upon the Hot Springs reservation in any way; and in addition to that she has over six hundred acres in that part of the Hot Springs reservation that is laid off as a part of the town of Hot Springs yet to sell. Over six hundred acres of the land are yet to be sold, and are to be sold at their appraised value, and if property has gone up very much as has been suggested by the Senator from Kansas, the Government will get the benefit of that enhanced value on this property that she holds free from any claims, that is already laid off in town lots and will be put into market just as soon as this matter can be settled.

Then in addition to that the Government has retained as a permanent reservation over twelve hundred acres of that plat of land. Out of the four sections the Government still retains about one-half as a permanent reservation, and will under this arrangement receive back from the occupying claimants and from the rents she has already had every dollar that she has expended and will have the lots in over six hundred acres of land to sell at the enhanced price.

Now we do not say in our bill that this is oppressive; I do not regard it as oppressive to the people of Hot Springs—those persons who had sought to be the purchasers of this property. I do not think the bill oppressive to them, but they thought that it was quite onerous. They were very anxious that the House bill should pass that gave them the right to purchase this property at $10 an acre. They thought that was enough for them to pay, but we did not think so. We thought that, as to the property they had improved, it was fair and just and honest to give them one-half of its present value and require that they should pay the other half into the Treasury of the country. That is what we thought in committee, and that is the purpose of this bill; and in doing that we were careful to see that the United States would in this way, with what she had already received in rentals, be reimbursed for every dollar she had put upon the property in any way. Then she has this large amount yet that she will utilize hereafter I have no doubt by the sale of these lots, and when she thus realizes on them, in my opinion, she ought not to put the money into the general Treasury but she ought to put it upon the reservation—the twelve hundred acres that she has there yet and the springs that she has forever dedicated for the health of the country. There is where she ought to put it—not be speculating upon it but put it there at that place where it can give the only national benefit that it is capable of giving to the afflicted.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Kansas evidently misunderstands my objection. I did not object to anything in the bill or the lack of anything in the bill on the ground that the Government was not dealing generously with these people, and I do not find any fault in any particular with that; but I spoke of the striking out of the provision by which a man who had not been allowed by this commission to have the benefit of this generous action might have that decision of the commission reviewed. Now, it does not make very much difference to the man concerning whose title the commission adjudicated, by saying he had not any at all; if they said to a man "you cannot buy anything," it does not make any difference to him whether the land is sold at twenty-five cents on the dollar or fifty cents. It was for the saving of that class of men's rights that I spoke, men who were precluded from having the benefit of this benefaction, if it is one. But, as I remarked before, as it seems to be satisfactory to the committee and the Senators concerned, I will say nothing about it.

Mr. MAXEY. I have heard about this Hot Springs trouble ever since I have heard about anything. It has been a white elephant in the Land Office, among the people of Arkansas, in the Supreme Court, and in Congress, and was the prolific source of a shot-gun war for many years. Now, this bill appears to be satisfactory to the Senators from Arkansas, and I do hope and trust the bill will pass and let us get rid of the question.

Mr. PLUMB. I sympathize entirely with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Texas that this should be a finality; but I think I see in the last part of the last section of this bill the seeds of a great deal of legislation yet to come. It is provided in that section:

And the money arising from said sales, as well as any money paid in under section 9 of this act, shall be held as a special fund for the improvement and care of the permanent reservation at Hot Springs and of the Hot Springs Creek adjacent to and between the permanent reservations, and for the maintenance of free baths for the invalid poor of the United States, as provided by acts of Congress.

While it may seem a little ungracious to criticize that provision, I venture to say that if this money or any money is to be of any benefit to the invalid poor of the United States, it will be because Congress devotes a great deal of time to legislation on the subject of how they shall get it, and so on, and we shall have the matter before us at every session of Congress from now on until the end of time, and it will be a source of a great deal of expense, and it will ultimately come to be, I have no doubt, a Hot Springs bureau and general sanitarium, for which perhaps an amendment to the Constitution or something of that kind will be needed. We shall get into the business of healing the sick. Without saying anything as to the propriety of the Government getting into that business by way of competition with the various schools of medicine in the country, I can imagine, as anybody else readily can, that it will be a subject of a great deal of expense.

In committee, for one, when this subject was first considered, I said unreservedly that I preferred to give this entire reservation to the State of Arkansas. I am of that mind now. No regulation that Congress can or will provide in its cumbersome way of doing business, will ever result in giving any more benefit to the poor sick people of the United States, from these springs than private competition will do.

In the next place, while I have not any doubt, and am not permitted to doubt that these springs contain great medicinal qualities that are of very great benefit to some classes of invalids, I believe there are within the limits of the same State, and in the same direction, other springs equally as valuable. It is not long since I was solicited by a gentleman to ask Congress to prevent the acquisition by private parties of the title to the Eureka Springs, in Carroll County, Arkansas. It was stated to me by him, and also by the Senator from Arkansas, near me, [Mr. WALKER,] that the springs there had proved to be of great value, and poor people had come from all parts of the country to the number of thousands; they were there in wagons and tents to avail themselves of the benefits of those springs; and now some fellow, without the fear of the sick people before his eyes, had proposed to homestead the particular piece of ground on which the springs were located. The aid of Congress was sought to be invoked by this communication, to prevent the consummation of that, said to be, wrong.

I was myself at first rather impressed with that idea and proposed to assist in interposing; but on consideration of the subject I concluded on the whole that it might just as well pass into the hands of some man who would appreciate the advantages of it enough to induce him to make the advantages of it as widely applicable as possible in order that he might derive a revenue from it. So there are springs in Colorado, there are springs all over the country possessing more or less medicinal qualities. People differ about their relative merits, of course. The fact is that unless the Government is going into the business generally and is going to take under its control all these places where the sick may be healed by the application of that which is natural to the place it might just as well let the Hot Springs go along with the rest; to use a homely western phrase, let the tail go with the hide. The Government owns a great many of these springs all over Colorado; it owns probably a hundred, which some day will come into more or less note as places of resort for people who are ailing. The Hot Springs will be only one of a great many. Of course, if the Government is going into this business there, it might as well take them all under its protecting wing, and not make an exception of this and beautify this one, and make this one the subject of legislation and of regulation, leaving all the others to take care of themselves in the hands of whoever may come to own them under the land laws of the United States.

In pursuance of this idea that I have expressed, and which I have always entertained, that this should not be made the subject of Government control, I move to strike out all after the word "sales," in line 9 of section 15, to the end of the section, and insert "shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States."

If the Senator from Arkansas proposes to me that the money shall be given to the State of Arkansas or anybody else, I say as a matter of economy that would be a wise way of disposing of it. It would be better now to give this money to the State of Arkansas for that purpose, or to do any other thing with it, than to put it absolutely in the Treasury of the United States, to be the subject of future disposition, with legislation for the regulation, beautifying, and general management of this sanitarium.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the bill then be subject to amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Of course further amendments in the Senate will be in order. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] which he will please state.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I sincerely hope that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas will not prevail.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to strike out all after the word "sales," in line 9 of the last section, as follows:

As well as any money paid in under section 9 of this act, shall be held as a special fund for the improvement and care of the permanent reservation at Hot Springs and of the Hot Springs Creek, adjacent to and between the permanent reservations, and for the maintenance of free baths for the invalid poor of the United States, as provided by acts of Congress.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The section now provides that the money arising from these sales shall be used as a special fund for the improvement of the permanent reservation at Hot Springs and to maintain free baths. It is not a question of whether the State of Arkansas is going to get this reservation. Congress has decided in passing the act of March 3, 1877, to preserve these sections as a permanent reservation for the benefit of the people of the United States. It did not purpose to give them to Arkansas. We do not want any other disposition of this money except to improve the baths there, and also to allow them to be given for the use of invalids, and to beautify and adorn the town.

There is a great difference between the Hot Springs and the small springs all over the United States. The Hot Springs is one of the most remarkable places in the world. In their medicinal qualities those springs are very remarkable; they were thirty or forty years ago. I know persons who went to the Hot Springs nearly doubled up with the rheumatism thirty years ago, when it was almost impossible to get there, when some sort of conveyance had to be improvised from Little Rock to take them to the Hot Springs, and after they had been there six months were cured, permanently cured. I myself was in the Legislature of Illinois in 1843 with a gentleman who was nearly doubled up with the rheumatism, and it was with great difficulty that he could be got on the boat at Saint Louis. I was present at the time he undertook the passage to Little Rock. I saw him six months afterward when he was permanently cured.

I do believe it is the wise policy to preserve these springs as a permanent reservation, as a great sanitarium for this country. The time may come when we shall want to establish a marine hospital there, or some sort of hospital for the poor of the country; and who would talk now of giving these springs to the State of Arkansas? I have great faith in the State of Arkansas, but I would not give them to the State of Arkansas. I would rather cut off my right finger than to give them to Arkansas or anybody else. I want them to be preserved perpetually for the use of those who need their medicinal properties.

Mr. PLUMB. In saying what I did about giving these springs to the State of Arkansas, I only referred to it incidentally, for that point is not practically before the Senate. I only spoke of it as one disposition that might be made. I think it would be better to have the control in the State of Arkansas than in the United States. Nor do I care to advertise these springs unnecessarily either by the United States or otherwise; but if the Senator from Illinois had been acquainted with the country west of the Missouri River I think I could call his attention to some springs there of great merit.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. These are known to be great, and have been for thirty or forty years.

Mr. PLUMB. Other springs have great reputations in their way considering the time they have been occupied.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. When they come here we will talk about them.

Mr. PLUMB. They belong now to private parties. The Las Vegas Springs in Colorado are highly spoken of, and remarkable cures are said to have been effected there. The logic of this is that the Government shall own all these places. I think it desirable to get rid of this matter as a mere question of economy.

Mr. CALL. I merely want to say one word. I hope the amendment moved by the Senator from Kansas may not be adopted. I agree heartily with the Senator from Illinois.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAXEY. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 98. I will state to the Senate that I do not desire to proceed with the bill to-day, but it is an important bill, which I gave notice of some time ago, and I wish to call it up in order that it be left as the unfinished business.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Texas will allow the unfinished business of the morning hour to progress far enough to have the bill that was under consideration disposed of. It probably will not take five minutes.

Mr. HOAR. The motion of the Senator from Texas is not understood on this side of the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He asked the Senator to take up and consider at this time a bill, the title of which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. No. 98) to provide for the settlement of accounts with certain railway companies."

Mr. McDONALD. I see that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is not present this morning and I feel, therefore, that it will be my duty—I know it was his purpose if he was here—to insist that the Geneva award bill be made the special order after the disposition of the bill which has just passed the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I thought that was understood to be the arrangement. I hope the Senator from Texas will not antagonize it.

Mr. McDONALD. I feel compelled to antagonize the motion of my friend from Texas by a motion to take up the Geneva award bill.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that that was certainly the understanding with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] when he got up the Hot Springs bill; and the Senator from Arkansas actually took the floor on the Geneva award bill.

Mr. MAXEY. I was not aware that I was to be met by that difficulty. I desire to say that this is a very important bill which I want disposed of. It has been in committee long enough. I do not want to interfere with the Geneva award bill or anybody else's rights; and now, if it be satisfactory to the Senate, I give notice that when the Geneva award bill is through with I shall ask the Senate to take up this bill and dispose of it. I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. McDONALD. If the morning business is over, I move—

Mr. MORRILL. No, there was a bill pending in the morning hour. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana is occupying the floor.

Mr. McDONALD. Unless some Senator has some special matter of the morning hour which he wants considered, I move that the morning business be considered closed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand the Senator.

Mr. McDONALD. I move to take up what is known as the Geneva award bill. When that is taken up and becomes the special order, I am perfectly willing it shall be laid aside until Monday.

Several SENATORS. That will do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the question is on laying aside the pending order, which is the Anthony rule. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD FUND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Geneva award bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1194) for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award.

Mr. MAXEY. Just one moment. I am perfectly willing to have the Geneva award bill taken up and disposed of, but so soon as that is done I hope the friends of that bill will aid me in getting up the bill to which I have called attention.

Mr. GARLAND. I have the floor on the Geneva award bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GORDON. With the consent of the Senator from Arkansas, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and twenty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 19, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PILOTAGE COMMISSION.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, presented a resolution of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, praying Congress to enact a law for the appointment of a commission to be composed of men conversant with maritime affairs, for the purpose of considering and reporting what general laws can be framed in relation to pilotage as will be suitable for all the waters of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. CARLISLE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 4812) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue, with sundry amendments thereto; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CRAFTS J. WRIGHT.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 752) granting an increase of pension to Crafts J. Wright, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to submit at this time a report from the Committee on the Depression of Labor, in the form of a resolution, and ask that the same may go to the Public Calendar, and that the report be printed. There is also a minority report which I ask may take the same course.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to give notice to the Chinese government that it is the desire of the Government of the United States that the clauses of the treaties between the two governments, which allow and permit immigration of the subjects and citizens of the two countries, be abrogated and annulled.

Mr. FRYE. Is that a report from a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is a majority report.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is also a minority report, which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COWGILL] will submit, and I ask that the minority report be printed, to accompany the majority.

Mr. CONGER. Both of these reports go to the House Calendar, as I understand.

The SPEAKER. They do when presented. The gentleman from Indiana, who is to submit the minority report, does not appear to be in his seat.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for him and in his name that the minority report be filed, and that it be printed to accompany the majority report, and that both be referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. I would like to inquire what committee that is from.

The SPEAKER. It is from the Committee on the Depression of Labor.

Mr. MARTIN, of North Carolina. There are three reports from that committee.

There being no objection, the majority and minority reports were referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am also instructed by the select committee to inquire into the causes of the depression of the industries of the country to report the resolution which I send to the desk for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the majority and minority reports of the select committee to inquire into the causes of the depression of the industries of the country and especially labor, on the question of Chinese immigration, be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that. The question of Chinese immigration was not referred to that committee. Let the report be printed in the ordinary way. We can tell better after seeing it if we need five thousand copies of it.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman from Michigan raised an objection when the testimony was reported, and when I asked the permission of the House to have additional copies printed he had that resolution sent to the Committee of the Whole, and there it lies. Now I merely ask that additional copies of the report and not of the testimony be printed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan object to the introduction of the resolution? It goes to the Committee on Printing, under the law.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTING AND PUBLICATION OF DEBATES OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I am instructed by the committee to report back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2657) to prohibit the reporting or publication at the public expense of the debates of Congress. I move that the bill be laid upon the table, and that the accompanying report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back, with an adverse recommendation, petitions from citizens of the State of New York, asking that the proceedings of Congress be printed in newspaper form, to be sent free of charge to every family in the United States. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom were referred seven petitions from citizens of New York, asking that the proceedings of Congress be printed in newspaper form, to be sent free of charge, to every family in the United States, have considered the same, and report thereon that although they have not been able to obtain from the Public Printer an estimate in regard to the probable cost of such a publication, they feel assured that it would cause an immense outlay of public moneys, aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

They therefore report back said petitions adversely, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The New York Herald estimates that the cost would be about $4,000,000 a day.

The petitions were laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF UNITED STATES FISH COMMISSION.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with amendments, the Senate concurrent resolution to print 3,000 copies of each of the five volumes of the reports of the United States Fish Commission.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That 3,000 sets of the five volumes of the reports of the United States Fish Commission be printed from the stereotype plates, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

The amendments proposed by the committee were read, as follows:

1. In lines 4 and 5 strike out "1,000" and insert "700."
2. In lines 5 and 6 strike out "1,500" and insert "1,800."

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

REPORT ON ROCKY MOUNTAIN LOCUSTS, ETC.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the House concurrent resolution for printing the report of the United States Entomological Commission on the Rocky Mountain Locust.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed with necessary illustrations, at the Government Printing Office, 10,000 copies of the second report of the United States Entomological Commission on the Rocky Mountain Locust and other injurious insects: 5,000 copies for the use of the House, 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 copies for the use of the commission.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. This provides for printing exactly the same number of copies as we printed of the first volume.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORTS OF GEOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEY.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am also instructed to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the concurrent resolution of the Senate for the printing of the final reports of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, for the use of the Department of the Interior, 1,500 copies each of volumes 4 and 12, and 1,200 copies each of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations, uniform with the edition ordered by Congress.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I desire to say one word. There are now in the Interior Department a number of odd volumes and this is simply to make up the sets so that they can be distributed among the colleges and institutions of the several States.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORT ON COTTON-WORM.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the Senate concurrent resolution for the printing of additional copies of Bulletin No. 3 of the United States Entomological Commission on the Cotton-Worm.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of Bulletin No. 3 of the United States Entomological Commission on the Cotton-Worm: 6,000 copies for the use of the House, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 for the use of the Department of the Interior.

The resolution was agreed to.

WAGES IN PRINTING OFFICE ON LEGAL HOLIDAYS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom were referred a memorial of the employees of the Government Printing Office and a letter of the Public Printer, relative to pay for legal holidays, to report a joint resolution providing for payment of wages to employees in the Government Printing Office for legal holidays.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER. It is not a privileged report and the gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I understand that it is not a privileged report. Let it go to the Calendar for consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT. It does not belong to the Calendar.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I withdraw the report.

CORRECTION OF RECORD.

Mr. FIELD. In the RECORD I am put down as suggesting that the words "of the district" be inserted in the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I made no such suggestion. What I did suggest was this, that instead of the district judge of the district having the authority in the absence of the circuit judge, it should be the district judge assigned to that duty by the circuit judge in accordance with the provisions made for the appointment of supervisors. I am by what has been printed in the RECORD made to suggest what I believe to be an incongruity and which I endeavored to correct.

REPORTS OF CLARENCE KING.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Printing, reported back adversely the joint resolution (H. R. No. 50) providing for the printing of 1,200 copies of the reports of Clarence King; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RILEY'S REPORT ON GRASSHOPPERS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, from the same committee, also reported back adversely the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a communication from Professor C. V. Riley, chief of the United States entomological commission, recommending the publication of an edition of 30,000 copies of his report on grasshoppers; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM KERR.

Mr. HAWLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5257) for the relief of William Kerr, late private Company I, Fifth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I propose to offer to the resolution concerning the interoceanic canal.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be referred to that committee; perhaps the committee will adopt it.

Mr. TUCKER. The committee has already reported on the subject, and the amendment is one which I propose to offer when I have the opportunity.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amend first resolution:
In seventh line strike out word "concerns" and insert "political institutions or systems of government."
In ninth and tenth lines strike out "acquisition in any other way" and insert "otherwise."
In tenth and eleventh lines strike out "is a" and insert "are."
In fourteenth line, after word "doctrine," insert "and in other more recent declarations."
In fifteenth line strike out "an" and insert "the."
In sixteenth line, after word "safety," add "of the United States."
Substitute for second and third resolutions:
2. That, in accordance with the foregoing declaration of public policy, based upon the clear and indisputable right of self-preservation and the importance of perpetuating the republican institutions established by the Constitution of the United States, and especially in view of the necessity of free and unrestricted water transit for persons and produce between the Atlantic and Pacific States of the Union, it is a paramount interest of the people of the United States that no canal, railroad, or other artificial communication across the isthmus connecting the North and South American continents, for the transfer of vessels and cargoes from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, whether the same be built or constructed at Panama, Nicaragua, or elsewhere, should be in the possession or under the control or government of any European or other foreign power, which would imperil this vital interest of the people of this country; and while recognizing the right of other nations of the world to this interoceanic highway for universal commerce, the United States will insist that by reason of its proximity to them, and of its importance as a water-way between the States of the Union, the interests of commerce must yield to the right of national safety; and it is therefore the duty of Congress to declare that, whether it be constructed by foreign governments or by corporations deriving their being and authority from foreign governments, the United States will assert and maintain their right to see that nothing shall be done in the premises which shall not fully secure a free and unrestricted commerce and intercourse by means of such interoceanic highway between the States of the Union in time of public war, as well as of peace; and the United States cannot admit the right of any government, by treaty or otherwise, to grant to any other foreign power, or to any corporation created or authorized by any foreign power, any privilege, right, or authority in respect to such interoceanic highway as will be inconsistent with their peace and security, and with a free commerce and intercourse among the States of the Union.
3. That the President be requested to take necessary and proper steps, to carry into effect the foregoing declarations of public policy.

HENRY M. SHREVE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2477) for the relief of the heirs of Henry M. Shreve, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MINING DÉBRIS IN SACRAMENTO RIVER.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House, for the use of the Committee on Commerce and the Committee on Mines and Mining, the report of Colonel G. H. Mendall, United States engineer in California, relating to the effect of mining debris in the Sacramento River and its tributaries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I have been instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report to the House certain bills and ask that they be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

Mr. TAYLOR. I ask consent to have taken from the Speaker's table—

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I call for the regular order.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour, and to-day being Friday—

Mr. MILLS. I have a resolution pending in relation to holding night sessions for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar. That resolution has laid over one day under the rule, and I now call it up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Monday, the 15th instant, the House of Representatives shall hold evening sessions every evening, beginning at 7.30 p. m., for the consideration of the Private Calendar; and all bills shall be disposed of in the order in which they stand upon the same.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "15th" and inserting "22d."

Mr. WILLIS. Let it be made to read "every alternate evening."

Mr. MILLS. Let us get through with the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the resolution will be before the House for consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. MILLS. Is it not a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It is not a question of privilege.

Mr. MILLS. But having laid over one day under the rule, is it not my privilege to call it up?

The SPEAKER. There is no rule on that subject.

Mr. MILLS. The Chair so stated when I offered the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that it might lie over; but the Chair does not recollect that he said the resolution was a privileged matter. It is always within the power of the House to take a recess any day.

Mr. MILLS. At what time will the resolution be in order, so that I may have a vote of the House upon it?

The SPEAKER. It would not come up at any time in that way; it might be brought before the House by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. It can be taken up now by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. MILLS. Is there any rule under which I can obtain a vote of the House on this resolution?

The SPEAKER. There is a rule providing that the House may on any day by a majority vote determine to take a recess. This resolution does not have any privilege attached to it. The Chair will ask consent of the House that it be taken up.

Mr. FRYE. By the new rules the motion for a recess is made a motion that is always in order.

The SPEAKER. It is; and the gentleman can reach his object in that way. Is there objection to considering at this time the resolution which has been read?

Mr. BLOUNT. I object. I am opposed to night sessions any way.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMAHON. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the House will do nothing of the sort; we should dispose of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRIGHT. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] I move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. COX. I ask the attention of my friend—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COX. I wish to state to the House, if I can have its attention, that the Committee on the Census—

The SPEAKER. That subject is not before the House.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] which is now pending, is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. McMAHON. The business in which the gentleman from New York is interested would not be in order in the morning hour at any rate.

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. COX. There ought to be unanimous consent to take up this subject; otherwise the business of the Census Office will have to stop.

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the morning hour should be dispensed with, will not the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be in order later in the day?

The SPEAKER. The plan adopted last Friday was first to move to dispense with the morning hour; then a motion was made to dispense with the consideration of private business. Under the new rules, both motions require a two-thirds vote.

The motion of Mr. McMAHON to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. MILLS. I move that at the close of the session to-morrow (it is agreed, I understand, that the session of to-morrow shall be for discussion only) a recess be taken until Monday night for the purpose of considering at that time the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, because the only recess that could be taken at the close of to-morrow's session would be a recess until Monday morning. The motion of the gentleman from Texas would carry the recess beyond the time fixed for the regular meeting of the House on Monday.

Mr. McMAHON. I understand that the gentleman from New York wishes to bring to the attention of the House something with reference to a conference report.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from New York a conference report?

Mr. COX. No, sir; but I wish to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks consent to make a statement touching census legislation.

A MEMBER. For how long?

Mr. COX. Only a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman's occupying one minute.

Mr. COX. I desire to say that the Senate has sent to us a bill affecting in many respects the taking of the census. The Superintendent of the Census is now awaiting action upon this bill. Several weeks have passed since it came to us. The Census Office is anxious to have this matter under way. The Committee on the Census have instructed me to report back the Senate bill with a recommendation of disagreement as to many of its features, but agreement as to the essential urgent features. If the House will give us twenty or perhaps ten minutes on this subject we can have a committee of conference and put this matter in shape for the taking of the tenth census.

The SPEAKER. A conference committee could not be appointed until the Senate had disagreed to the House amendments.

Mr. COX. I think I could get that done to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to report from the Census Committee the bill which he has indicated.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I would like to hear the amendments read.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not yet before the House. The gentleman from New York, on behalf of the Committee on the Census, asks consent that he may be allowed to report the bill with the amendments at this time.

Mr. McMAHON. Before unanimous consent is given, I want some distinct understanding as to the time this is to occupy.

Mr. BLAND. I think this had better wait until the appropriation bill is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri object?

Mr. BLAND. I do.

The SPEAKER. That ends the matter.

Mr. McMAHON. I move to dispense with the consideration of private business for to-day.

The motion was agreed to; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McMAHON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4924) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to amend the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] as amended. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "special deputy marshals" in the second line of the substitute insert the words "and general deputy marshals;" and in the fifth line, after the words "special deputy marshals," insert the words "or of general deputy marshals."

Mr. CALKINS. As I understand, the pending amendment is to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] as amended by the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SIMONTON.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. The Clerk will report the substitute as it would read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

For special deputy marshals of elections, the sum of $7,600: Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections, for performing any duties in reference to any election, shall receive the sum of $5 per day in full for their compensation; and that all appointments of such special deputy marshals having any duty to perform in respect to any election shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the district judge of the district in the absence of the circuit judge.

And not less than two nor more than three appointments shall be made for any voting precinct where such appointments are required to be made; and the persons so appointed shall be of different political parties; and if there are more than two political parties having tickets to be voted for, no two of said deputy marshals shall be appointed from the same party. And the persons so appointed shall be persons of good character, able to read and write the English language, and shall be well-known residents of the voting precinct in which their duties are to be performed; said special deputies to be appointed in equal numbers from the different political parties.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to ask the Chair whether this is open now to debate. Debate has not been closed by the House as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. There was some desultory debate on this proposition yesterday afternoon, but no regular debate under the five-minute rule. The Chair thinks, therefore, five minutes for this amendment and five minutes against it ought to be allowed.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to oppose the amendment.

Mr. SIMONTON. I desire to support it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize a gentleman in support of the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the question pending on my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. It is; and the gentleman from Tennessee has been recognized to discuss the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. After the gentleman has concluded I desire to submit a modification.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to submit a modification of his own amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; of the amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman had better make that modification now before the debate proceeds.

Mr. WARNER. Of course; let the modification first be made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I send to the Clerk's desk a modification of my amendment, and desire only one minute to explain the changes made, which are simply to make it conform to some requirements of the statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment before the committee does nothing more than insert the words "general deputy marshals" after the words "special deputy marshals." Now, that amendment which the gentleman has offered he has a right to modify.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not desire to modify that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman cannot do it now.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to move this as a modification of my other amendment, in case these are voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order now.

Mr. SIMONTON. Mr. Chairman, I trust the substitute as amended by my amendment will be incorporated in the bill and become the law of the land.

Sir, I regard the Federal election laws as hurtful and dangerous, though they have been declared constitutional by the proper tribunal. It is not every constitutional measure that is wise or beneficial or worthy to remain on the statute-book. The election laws are, in my judgment, dangerous innovations on the system of government our fathers gave us; they are calculated in their nature and do disarrange and destroy the nicely adjusted balance of power between the States and the Federal Government. These election laws are violative of all the honored precedents of this country in the matter of elections for nearly a century. And as they stand now, they confer on the Administration and its partisans a power to control elections, and consequently to perpetuate its reign indefinitely, that is simply monstrous, and it seems to me a wonder that a free people, alive to the dangers that threaten their liberties, permit them to remain on the statute-book a single day un repealed.

Indeed the Representatives of this House, who are the exponents of the popular will of the Republic, since the 18th of last March have repeatedly passed an act repealing these election laws, placing the elections back just where our fathers put them, under the guardianship and protection of the people and local authorities, where a long experience has shown to be the safest and most sacred place, freest from frauds and corruptions; but these acts, thus repealing the election laws, have uniformly met the executive veto, and the will of the people thus voiced in legislative acts has again and again been annulled. The republican party, that has contended for keeping on the statute-book these unholy laws, has not dared to do so without expressing a willingness to correct some of their worst deformities. From the President down they have professed a willingness to amend and alter, so as to deprive them of what even they must admit to be unfair and dangerous operations. I desire, for one, to put these professions to the test of sincerity. And besides it is always wise and prudent to modify and make less objectionable and less dangerous that which we cannot remove altogether. If an apple were in my keeping that I could not rid myself of, and yet I might remove the worst of its reeking and offensive corruption and deodorize the remainder, it would be folly not to do so. And though I would most gladly remove entirely the dangerous power conferred in these Federal election laws by repealing them outright since we cannot do this, as past experience has shown, I shall vote to cut off as much of this dangerous power as I can and shield as far as I may be able the ballot-box and the purity of elections from the power of corrupt and debauched partisans, and from the absolute control of a party and an Administration whose past history shows them to be reckless and defiant, and unscrupulous of the methods and means by which they retain possession of power.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, a word first to those on this side of the House who have substantially agreed with me against all political riders on appropriation bills. I announce now that even though a political rider meet my views, and would be supported otherwise by me, I never will vote for a political rider upon an appropriation bill. I never will vote for a bill if I can see any other way out of it which has upon it a political rider, let that come from whichever side of the House it may.

In the next place, sir, a spirit of fairness, a spirit of justice, leads me to say that were a single and substantive principle contained in the amendment presented to the House as an amendment to the election laws, or standing alone, it would meet my hearty approval and support. That part of it which provides that the deputy marshals shall be appointed by the courts and from opposite political parties would meet my approval, my idea having been so admirably presented by the gentleman from Ohio, namely: I am willing to surrender a party advantage for the good of my country.

I am opposed to another feature of the amendment which limits deputy marshals to three. In my judgment, if we are to continue the system at all, marshals ought to be continued in sufficient numbers to do some good; and to cut the number down to three simply and solely destroys them on election day from doing good or rendering useful service to their country. I say to my republican friends that, in whatever shape it may come, standing upon principle, you cannot support a political rider on a bill of this kind.

In the next place, presented as it is, it cannot meet the views of any one who believes it is the constitutional right and duty of the Government to furnish protection on election day, as well as all others, to the people. For, Mr. Chairman, these laws have no horror to the peaceable, quiet, and law-abiding men of the country. To every man who is in the peace of the State and of the United States, these election laws present no bugbear. It is only to the criminal classes, it is only to the men who want to override all that is good, all who love order, that these election laws present this bugbear which gentlemen on the other side speak of. I, sir, am one who in peace am a peace man, and in war a war man; and when this country is at peace, I want officers enough, no matter from where or whence they come, to protect the peace of election day, as well as of all others.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, although presented by the chairman of the committee of which I am a member, did not meet my views there except in reference to one particular which I have announced, that I am willing to surrender any party advantage for the good of my country. When presented in that light, and that alone, it shall meet my hearty support.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio as amended.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Let my friend from Illinois withdraw his amendment and I will renew it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the House, and particularly of my democratic colleagues, upon this proposition. I shall vote for the pending proposition, and in doing so do not concede or mean to concede anything from the position I have heretofore held of the right of Congress, the representatives of the people to withhold appropriations to the execution of laws they believe to be either unconstitutional, unwise, or unjust.

But, Mr. Chairman, the attention of my democratic friends for one moment. We find these laws upon the statute-books. If they are not modified the administrators of the republican party in the coming presidential and congressional elections can appoint ad infinitum deputy marshals throughout the country. And in doing so if we believe that they will use them for partisan advantage or for partisan purposes they can so conduct the election as to secure a majority of the next House, and by securing that majority provide payment for all the marshals and deputy marshals they may choose to appoint. That brings me to a practical question, and I say here in looking forward now at this moment to the responsibility which may rest upon me and every member of this House during the months of January and February next, when we shall determine who has been fairly, legally, and constitutionally elected President of the United States, and when the distinguished, if I may call him the conservative, member of the republican party [Mr. GARFIELD] comes forward and tenders to the House a compromise on this question, and that compromise, as we have amended it, provides that we shall have a fair and impartial election next November—I say we owe it to ourselves and to the country, its peace and future harmony, to accept the modification and enact it into a law, and let us have under it a peaceful and impartial election. In doing so, we abandon no principle, but govern ourselves by the practical difficulties which we find in our way.

Mr. Chairman, I have been taught by the logic of events if nothing else; I have been taught in this country that for remedying vicious legislation there are but two appeals under the laws and the Constitution. The first is an appeal to the courts of the country, and the second is an appeal to the ballot-box. Grant, if you please, the courts have declared the law to be unconstitutional. We have our reserved right of withholding appropriations as the representatives of the people as the remedy. We have, second, the ballot-box to which we can appeal. Take good care—I appeal to the lovers of the country—take good care that we have a fair, impartial election, and I stand here in view of my responsibility and my position as a representative of the people, and say that whoever is elected, fairly and impartially elected, shall be inaugurated by my vote, come from whatever quarter he may. That is all I ask. That is all that should be granted.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose for my part to reply to the expressions of affection of the gentleman from Tennessee for his country. I find the gentlemen on the other side have followed Mrs. Malaprop's advice on that subject, and have about all of them begun their love for their country with a little judicious hatred. I remember how during the last session of Congress some fifty gentlemen on the other side of the House, with striking unanimity and without so much as a smile as they looked into each others' countenances, declared that these supervisors and marshals laws were all unconstitutional. And yet the Supreme Court of the United States has declared them to be constitutional. I do not mention this in any spirit of reproach to these fifty democratic gentlemen. I only mention it to show how little constitutional law our Supreme Court actually knows. [Laughter.]

But I do not intend to revive that ancient discussion, although it seems as if no democrat was able to talk upon this subject without bringing it up as a sort of memorial of last year's fight. I purpose to confine myself to this interesting compromise, which, as the gentleman from Tennessee says, has been amended after it was made. Now, Mr. Chairman, I object to this amendment, and I object to it upon principle. I say in the first place that we have no right to put such a political measure upon an appropriation bill, and upon that position I believe this side intend to stand.

I say, secondly, that if you are going to put any legislation on this bill, this is the last thing that should be permitted. It is right as the law now is to direct the judge of the circuit court to appoint supervisors, one from one party and one from another, because the supervisors occupy a judicial position; but there is no argument which justifies bringing in politics to the execution of the law. Nor is there anything which justifies dragging the judges of the courts into the active execution of the law.

I say this is in violation of every principle of a decent form of government. The party that is in power is responsible for the execution of the laws, and should have the control of the appointments to execute the laws. Nor is it right or just to make the circuit judges appoint executive officers. The law says that the marshal and his general deputies shall execute the law; and it is proposed here to take out of the hands of the marshal the appointment of the very officers upon whom he is to depend for such execution. And they call this providing for the peace and tranquillity of the country!

Have any of those gentlemen in their own States ever proposed that the democratic sheriff shall be controlled in the appointment of his deputies to oversee the preservation of peace? No, they never have. Their sole purpose and object is to weaken laws which are wise, salutary, sensible, and conducive to the best interests of the country; and they themselves know what their motive is. Their motive is to enable them to trample down the safeguards which are going in the next election to preserve the peace and the rights of the people and of the country, and with my consent they never shall do it. I do not believe that we mean to accept any such infamous crippling of the laws of the country, especially as those laws have received the sanction and support of the highest tribunal of the land.

I am perfectly willing to admit that the democratic party is consistent in its attitude toward the Supreme Court. From its earliest history it has opposed that great tribunal. There never was but one exception, and that was when the Supreme Court decided in favor of the constitutionality of the infamous fugitive-slave law. That is the only aberration, and they are determined by consistent uniformity to make up for that temporary aberration. [Applause from republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUCKNER rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUCKNER. I renew it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to withdraw the amendment that the whole proposition may be voted on.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment cannot be withdrawn, objection being made. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] and renewed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] as amended.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "elections," in the second line, insert "and general deputy marshals," and after the word "marshals," in the fifth line of the amendment, insert "or of general deputy marshals."

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 88, noes 84.

So the amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to amend by striking out "two" and inserting "two and a half."

I offer this amendment that I may have the opportunity of entering my protest against some of the political heresies that have been asserted on this floor, in the discussions on this bill. Mr. Chairman, it has been asserted here that because the Supreme Court of the United States has decided the election law to be constitutional, therefore this Congress is not only bound to make the appropriation which is asked for, and to go back upon what we have done heretofore, believing this law not only unconstitutional but impolitic and injurious to the best interests of the country, but that we are bound as members of Congress to admit that that decision of the Supreme Court has such obligatory power that Congress is divested of all control over the subject, and that we must simply obey its behests. The Supreme Court having decided it to be constitutional, it is claimed that it is not only of binding authority upon all the district and United States courts and the executive officers for the administration of the laws, but that it is, I suppose, obligatory on the President as well as us; that it is obligatory and binding upon this Congress; and that a tribunal appointed by the Executive and confirmed by the Senate is paramount in authority over all, and that we must all bow when they speak, and that no one can utter a word of dissent from their opinion. That has been the doctrine that has been assumed here, and which has been to some extent yielded even by gentlemen on this side.

I am opposed to this amendment simply because it is an apparent concession to that pestiferous and dangerous idea that seems to have got hold of this side of the House as well as that. I deny that because the Supreme Court has decided the election law constitutional we are under any obligation to change our opinions or our action to carry it out in any form whatever.

Mr. SCALES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. I have hardly time to yield.

If I were a judge of a United States circuit or district court or a State court and held the opinion I do upon this subject that this law is unconstitutional, I should, holding an authority subordinate to that tribunal, whatever my own opinions were, bow in submission to the decision of the Supreme Court. But when it comes to be a question between this Congress and a coequal and co-ordinate department of this Government, then I say to bow to it is to yield to this tribunal, irresponsible to anybody, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, authority to control all the departments of the Government and make them paramount to every other power in it.

A MEMBER. And wholly irresponsible to the people.

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes; as my friend suggests, and as I thought I had said, wholly irresponsible to the people, holding their offices for life. It may be packed, as has been charged here, for the accomplishment of a certain purpose, and when that is done, we are told that we are not only bound to carry out its behests, but that its decisions bind every department of the Government as well as all inferior officers. Do democrats recollect the doctrines maintained by the democratic party years ago, and carried out by that immortal patriot and hero, General Jackson? If he had held to that doctrine, if the democratic party of that day had held the doctrine now urged here, the old Bank of the United States would now be in existence, or there would be another like it in its place. And why? Because the Supreme Court of the United States of that day—not a packed tribunal, as is charged against this one; not composed of men who in their decisions at one time upon an electoral commission had gone to the very extreme verge of State rights, and at another time had gone to the very extreme of consolidation or centralization of the powers of this Government—I say that the Supreme Court before the days of Jackson had decided that the United States Bank was constitutional.

What did he say when it was charged against him that he did not regard the decision of the highest judicial tribunal of the country? He said that he was sworn as they were to support the Constitution, and to support it as he understood it, and not as others construed it to mean.

There is this broad distinction to be made on this question: that all tribunals subordinate to the Supreme Court, State as well as national; all inferior officers, marshals and other executive officers, are bound by the decisions of that court. But when it comes to the legislative department of the Government we are just as free to exercise our own opinions upon any question that they have decided, and to act upon our opinions, as if they had made no decision at all or had decided in some other way. In other words, they have no binding and obligatory authority over us any more than the opinions of the supreme court of the State of Ohio, or of Missouri, or of Delaware.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY. There are some propositions stated by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] to which I yield a very hearty assent. I hold that the legislative branch of the Government is responsible to the Constitution and the country and to itself, and has the right to an honest difference of opinion with the Supreme Court. I bow to those decisions with the very highest respect. They are given by learned, able men, as far as possible removed from the temptations of political life, and their judgments are given after elaborate arguments by able counsel.

But when I come to vote here as a sworn legislator, having taken an oath to support the Constitution, after listening to all that the Supreme Court has said, I do claim the right to vote if necessary against the judgment of that court. I can readily specify instances where any man with a respect for human liberty and free government would do the same.

I never cared what the Supreme Court of the United States decided about the fugitive-slave law. There was not power enough in the world to make me move a hand or foot in support of that law or to vote a dollar for its execution, never! I fall back upon my rights as a legislator, as a member of an independent branch of this Government.

But these are very serious questions. It is not for a legislator lightly to take that ground. If gentlemen on the other side hold honestly that the election laws of this country are in moral enormity like the fugitive-slave law, then let them say so and decline to enforce them. Let them bring in a bill to repeal those laws; let them fight them if they can. Let them make their issues in a manly way and go before the country. If the election laws are their bête noire, their black enemy of the human race, let them say so. Mine was the fugitive-slave law. Let them go before the country on that proposition; I have no objection to that.

But I did not get up to argue the merits of this question. I got up because I have finally become entirely worn out with indignation against this outrage of political legislation upon a bill which is really a bill of charity and mercy. There are about thirty items in this appropriation bill, every one of them needed to-day for the public service. Some of them are for the payment of honest debts; debts as honest as your note or my note becoming due to-morrow. All these appropriations are now needed. It is an appropriation bill for immediate deficiencies; for instant wants, such as cannot wait for the ordinary deficiency appropriation bill. There are a thousand people who are to-day out of work for want of these very appropriations.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman if he did not—

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not want to be interrupted now. The public service is suffering for want of this money. The public service is suffering because the work cannot go on in the Government Printing Office; that is but one of the many items.

And yet we are put to the torture and torment here of a fierce political debate, in which the passions of gentlemen on both sides of the House are aroused; and that confounded debate is jammed right into the middle of a business relating to charity and mercy. I say it is an outrage upon all the forms of legislation. Mr. Chairman, I will not endure it; I will not vote now for a change or amendment of any of the election laws. I will vote against every political amendment which has been proposed or which may be proposed, whether the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] or of anybody else. And I will not vote for any appropriation bill that has in it any clause proposing a change or repeal of the election laws. [Applause on the republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

Mr. BUCKNER. I withdraw it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by adding to the amendment the following:

And provided further, That such deputy marshals shall not receive pay for a longer period than three days for any election.

Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment should prevail. I believe with others who have spoken here in the doctrine that there should be no Federal interference in elections. Either we are capable of self-government or we are not. If we are not capable, our system is a failure. If we are, we need no hands of ex-convicts, unscrupulous partisans, and political adventurers surrounding the ballot-box to spy into it, like a gang of envious eunuchs around the oriental harem. [Laughter.] I believe for one that we should have no such espionage. I have voted and will vote again for the repeal of these laws outright. They are anti-republican, and should be repealed. Men on both sides of this Chamber have lauded to the skies, and justly, the independence of the three different branches of the Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. But what is the effect of these election laws? They destroy this independence and give complete control of the other branches to the judicial department of the Government, by permitting the judiciary to control elections. I hear one ask how?

It results in this way: the President appoints the judge; the judge appoints the supervisors; and they control the elections and thereby elect the President and Congress. Where is the boasted independence? Can there be any doubt in a sane man's mind as to what must be the result of such a course? Can there be doubt that it tends directly and inevitably to centralization and despotism? These election laws are but the cap-sheaf of Federal interference through the judiciary. For one, I think we have had enough of it.

But we find these laws on the statute-book; we are not able to repeal. As legislators, it behooves us to do the next best thing possible. If we cannot repeal them as we desire, let us cheapen their enforcement and strike off by amendment all the obnoxious features we can. It is time, as I have stated, that we should have no interference in elections; but if we are to have it, let us have as little of it as possible, and pay supervisors for a shorter time than ten days. My amendment, if it passes, will save the Government thousands of dollars every year. I hope it will be adopted, and that hereafter we will not have to pay deputy marshals for ten days' service in connection with every election.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. I had not intended to speak on this general subject. When I look at the bill as reported from the committee I do not find one word or one syllable upon the subject either of making or of refusing appropriations for special deputy marshals at elections. The bill as reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] contained no such proposition. On the contrary, it was a deficiency bill intended to pay to the marshals of the courts of the United States fees which in great part had already been earned by them. When the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] says that we are thrusting a political discussion into the very heart of this bill, which is intended to pay honest debts, I can only say that the heat of the political discussion seems to have sprung up on the opposite side. It was not proposed by the bill as reported to say anything upon the subject of special deputy marshals; but the bill does propose in terms to appropriate a certain amount out of the Treasury for the purpose of paying marshals of the courts in the discharge of their ordinary functions.

I have no hesitancy, therefore, in opposing the amendment offered by my respected friend from Tennessee, [Mr. McMILLIN;] and I regret that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] should have seen fit to offer any proposition looking to this question; it seems to me it would have been best to let the bill of the committee go through without amending it. When we come to the consideration of the question whether or not appropriations shall be made for the payment of special deputies to superintend elections, it will be time enough to consider and determine what we shall do. This bill has no such proposition in it; and the question arises alone upon the proposition which has been, I think, indiscreetly offered by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] But I never avoid any question. With reference to the laws providing for the appointment of supervisors by the Federal judges and for the appointment of deputies by the marshals to superintend elections, I have no hesitation in saying that in my judgment those laws have done more to corrupt elections than to insure a proper exercise of the elective franchise.

Whether you appoint a swarm of special deputies by the action of the marshals, or appoint but two or three by the action of the court, you are interfering with the great cardinal power of the States to conduct, control, and supervise their elections. I shall not consent now or at any time, so far as I am concerned, to any proposition which looks to sustaining these officers, who are, in my judgment, unwisely attempting to influence and control the elections in the States. This bill did not propose any such thing; the question is only presented in the amendment. As I understand, we are upon the record as opposed to appropriations designed for this purpose. I go one step farther. I dissent toto caelo from the proposition reiterated in this House, first on one side and then on the other, that the House of Representatives, the immediate representatives of the people, constituting with the Senate the legislative department of the Government, have under our system no power in analogy to that which exists in the English House of Commons. I say that, as the immediate representatives of the people, we hold the purse-strings of the nation, and they can only be unloosed by our vote. This power under our system of government can never be surrendered without surrendering one of the most important powers by which our English ancestors, through their representatives in the House of Commons, maintained the freedom of the people, and by which alone we can be enabled to preserve the liberties of our people against the encroachments of other departments of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EWING. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. The question pending is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EWING. Then I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw his amendment and I will renew it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will withdraw it on that understanding.

Mr. CONGER. I object to its withdrawal.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made the amendment cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. HAWLEY. Gentlemen can fix up their compromise to suit themselves; I desire to have nothing to do with it.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 15.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EWING. I move to strike out the last word of the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, these election laws having been declared to be constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States must be so treated pro tempore. I say pro tempore, because the public mind in this country will never accept as final a decision on a disputed question of constitutional law when the decision is obtained by a party division of that tribunal. Such a decision, so reached, is lasting only as a melancholy instance of the fact, of which the action of certain judges in the electoral commission three years ago convinced the people, that the fires of partisanship burn beneath the ermine just as fiercely as under the jackets of the people.

But for the time being this Federal election code must be treated as constitutional. I do not mean that because of this decision we as Representatives must vote any sum of money which may be demanded, or any sum of money at all, for the execution of laws which we believe to be vicious and dangerous to the liberties of the people. We have two paths open to us: we may amend those laws by stripping them of their partisan features. That is the proposition of compromise coming from the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] Shall we on our side accept it; or shall we rather walk the perilous edge we trod at the extra session? Shall we stand on our right as representatives of the people and guardians of their liberties and their treasure to withhold the money needed to execute this vicious legislation, a course warranted by many precedents, and vindicated in every generation among the noblest names in American political history? Let me remind my democratic friends, and especially those from the South, that, while the republican leaders were able in other days to call public opinion in the North to their support in withholding appropriations from laws they believed to be mischievous, the democracy have not been successful in following their example. We should be taught by the lessons of recent elections that we must place ourselves in our action here not only beyond the reach of candid objections, but also high above the cavil and clamor and misrepresentation which comprise the political capital of the republican party.

A decided majority of the people of the North are tired of the republican party. They would gladly give it some wholesome discipline as a minority party. It would do it good, and might after a while fit it to hold power again. That party knows the state of the public mind toward it. It has been taught by repeated elections that it has lost the confidence of the majority of the northern people, and that it must hold its relaxing grasp of power not by seeking popular judgment on its measures but by evading it. Condemned by public opinion, it has yet held on and on and on to power. How? By the clamor about "rebel brigadiers," by the lie that the people of the South mean to renew opposition to our constitutional Government, if not openly by secession, then secretly by nullification. If we now refuse to strip these laws of their partisan character; if we choose rather to exercise that extreme though often-acknowledged right of the Representatives of the people to refuse appropriations for the execution of bad legislation, we will hear the cry of "Nullification!" go up in the next campaign from every hilltop and valley in the North. We will find ourselves cut off from that appeal to the sober judgment of dissatisfied republicans on which we may rely with confidence, if their reason be not swallowed up and lost in sectional passion.

I appeal to my democratic friends to take this compromise now and extract the fang from these bad laws; and when they shall have ceased to be weapons of party advantage we will soon be able by common consent to sweep them from the statute-books, and to return to "the old paths, where is the good way." [Applause on the democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY. There is no compromise coming from us. We do not intend to have any compromise. [Laughter on the democratic side.]

Mr. McMAHON. You want them just as they are.

Mr. HAWLEY. We repudiate all compromises. I spit upon, scorn, and excrete all compromise.

Mr. McMAHON. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will be sent for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is not on the floor. Gentlemen must preserve order. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that gentlemen take their seats and preserve order on the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have no fault to find with gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. Their purposes are logical and their action consistent. But, sir, in my humble judgment, if the counsels of gentlemen on this side the Chamber for whom I have unbounded respect were or are to be followed, then that side will gain in this two or three days' struggle what they failed to accomplish at the three months' extra session of Congress. In saying this, I desire to accord to all who differ with me the same independence of judgment and action that I claim for myself. For one I desire no compromise and will vote for no amendment of this radical character to these laws, however attenuated or sugar-coated it may be. I will not do it either on or off from an appropriation bill until I am prepared to vote to sweep these laws bodily from the statute-book.

Sir, I am not so much concerned at this time about the manner or the agency by which the attempt has been made to enforce these laws in the past as I am, and as I believe the country is, in the manner in which they have been trampled down in outrage, in blood, and in death! A history which during the last five years has shocked Heaven as it should shame mankind! And until such things or evils shall be prevented, if they cannot be repressed, I think it no time for the republican party to stand here or elsewhere lamenting the past, making overtures for the future, or splitting hairs over this kind of amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I cannot yield if it is to come out of my time. I have heard it suggested by several gentlemen on this side of the House that if we were to fall into a minority then these laws modified by the proposed amendment might be a good thing for us. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to plan for victory rather than for defeat. When the question before this country is a question of enforcing or nullifying constitutional laws the republican party has no business to be in a minority. On such a question triumph is its duty and victory its right. [Laughter on the democratic side.]

Laugh, gentlemen, if that is your best and only response. Where duties are to be performed of a political character, or where elections are to be supervised or inspected, there I can well understand why both political parties should be represented; but when it comes to the execution of the law, where force is to be applied if need be, and where the executive, be he President, governor, sheriff, or constable, is responsible, then to talk about a double-headed President, a double-headed governor, or a double-headed sheriff or constable—you might as well talk about a double-headed commanding general on the battle-field!

Why, only look at it, Mr. Chairman: a deputy marshal of one party, backed by his friends, trying to make an arrest at an election poll, and a deputy marshal of another party, backed by his friends, trying to prevent it. Sir, whoever originates or develops that plan should, in my humble judgment, take out a patent for the best device ever concocted by mortal man for inaugurating election riots of the fiercest and bloodiest kind! And when you here increase the number by ten or more, I fear you have but added to the size of the mob ready to be led to the fray by political officials, who in turn would do things, when thus backed, they would never dare to do if left to their individual responsibility.

I need not remind gentlemen that party strife is to run high in this country during the next eight months, perhaps higher, fiercer, bolder, and more dangerous than ever before. Is this a time for a party or an administration charged with the enforcement of the laws to bate one jot or tittle of the constitutional power. For one, Mr. Chairman, I desire to hear no more about compromise of any kind. Compromise is not what gentlemen on the other side mean. They mean to weaken, break down, and nullify these laws. That is what they have virtually said time and again they would do. That is what they mean to do. Sir, I desire to see marshals appointed with great care; let them be men of character and courage; then let them go to the polls and fairly and fearlessly execute these laws, backed if need be by the whole power of the Government, and then for the faithful performance of their duties let them be held to a strict accountability by the country, and if need be before the courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. EWING. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to take any part in the debate which has been going on in regard to these election laws; but as in reference to all these matters we judge by comparison rather than in any other way, and as I found it necessary to examine the laws of the various States in the preparation of a bill which I offered at the extra session and which was an effort to eliminate all of us from the troubles of the extra session and pass a law agreeable to the compromise which I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to propose but which has been spurned by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]—I say from an examination of similar laws in the various States I have found that in nearly every State in this Union the necessity has been recognized which is provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, that officers of elections shall be equally divided between the parties then contesting before the country. It is the same nearly all over the country.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Does he not refer to executive officers? Does he refer to peace officers?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I deny that in regard to the State of Pennsylvania. The law of that State requires the constables to be present on election day to preserve the peace.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I have not yielded any portion of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I did yield to a question. I would state the law of Pennsylvania if I had time, because I am familiar with it as well as the laws of the other States. I know the gentleman cannot successfully contradict my statement that many of the States, and republican States at that, have found it necessary that the officers of the election shall be equally divided as near as may be between the different parties in the State, so that fairness at the election polls may be secured. Not only that, sir, but as has been suggested by a gentleman, in order that they may watch each other and see that fairness is done.

Upon the subject of the payment of these officers, after having examined the laws of nineteen States of this Union on this subject, that these very officers that this law proposes in every congressional election shall serve for ten days, and some of them without any limit, as in the case of the supervisors, if I recollect aright, the deputy marshals being limited to ten days, at a compensation of $5 a day—I say, after an examination of the laws of these nineteen States, there is not a single one of them, so far as I have been able to find, which provides for paying any such officer that amount of compensation or allowing them to serve any number of days exceeding four or five, which increased time applies only to officers of registration and not peace officers; and in nine-tenths of those that I have examined the service of those peace officers of elections is limited to a single day, and that the day of the election.

And I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who has proposed the compromise, which his party seems to spurn and to repudiate, that his State only allows officers to serve on election day and does not pay them exceeding the amount of one and a half dollars a day. The act reducing the amount from $2 a day was passed in 1862, and has stood there, according to my reading of the law, ever since. They have no supervisors and no deputy marshals appointed there by the State authority. The county officers and the township officers are charged with the duty of holding the elections as provided by the law; and in Cincinnati, the great metropolis of that State, there is no change from the ordinary State law, as far as I can find and so far as I am advised.

And so it is with the other States. If you go to Michigan you will find there that the first registration law that has been passed, so far as I have been able to ascertain, only pays the registrars for three days' service at the outside and $2 a day for their services, and the judges and inspectors of elections are paid one and a half dollars a day, and they are limited to one day's service.

I ask, if fairness in elections is all that is desired, why it is that when the National Government comes and puts forth its hand to interfere with elections in States—why it becomes necessary in order that those elections may be administered fairly and honestly that her officers shall be given such an extreme limit of time, and why the public Treasury shall be drained to this extent in order that the State law may be only aided in its administration?

A gentleman spoke of Pennsylvania a moment ago and alluded to Philadelphia. These laws were adopted in 1869 by the republican party of Pennsylvania and were modeled, I suppose, after the infamous registration laws of the South which drew their inspiration from the necessities of carpet-bag rule and stifled the voice of the people. But in Philadelphia they limited the time of service of these registrars, supervisors, or overseers, as they are called there, to five days, and their pay to $2 a day.

The republicans have full control in that State; all the officers of election are appointed by them; they appoint as many as they want, yet they leave the keeping of the peace to the ordinary officers, the constable, and that too without pay. If he can keep the peace without pay at an exciting State election, why is it necessary to spend, as was done in 1876, $150,000 out of the public Treasury on deputy marshals and supervisors alone, especially when the officers in charge have sworn it was wholly unnecessary, that they have already nine republican officers at each poll, and no democrat to connive at, much less perpetrate, a fraud. The election in Philadelphia does not cost the State of Pennsylvania or the city over $10,000, yet the Government pays one hundred and fifty thousand to have it supervised, against the evidence of republican officers that it is wholly unnecessary. In one district in Saint Louis seven hundred republican deputy marshals were appointed at one election. This would make $35,000, being enough to control any ordinary election by fraud. Why not follow the economical example the States have set us; limit the time and pay of these officers until there is no inducement to fraud, until the party in power cannot draw its campaign funds out of the public Treasury as the republican party has since 1872. They took two hundred and thirty-five thousand in 1874, and two hundred and eighty-five thousand in 1876. They may, unless we check them by some modification of the law, take a million this year and spend it in bribery to make Grant President. The question now is a question of economy as well as securing, if not a repeal of the law, a lessening of the power and opportunity to do wrong under it. We want to repeal it all; we believe it, in spite of the Supreme Court, unconstitutional. Unable to repeal it, we will modify and strip it of its partisan character and of its most objectionable features, especially the power under it to rob the Treasury. I am opposed to paying the deputy marshals in California anything. They had notice by our action last year we would not pay them, but rather than defeat this bill limiting their number and days of service and demanding that good men from both parties be appointed, I yield to necessity, and while not getting all I want, take all I can get.

The compensation, &c., of officers in certain States are as follows:

Ohio: No registration law. Trustees of towns act as judges of election. Town clerk and such other clerk as they select as clerks, and they serve on election day only as election officers, and their pay is $1.50 per day, to which it was reduced by act of April, 1862, from $2. (Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 532. See also Statutes of Ohio, volume 1, by Sawyer.)

Connecticut: A judge of the election is annually elected. He, together with the assessor and collector, constitute board of electors. (Nixon's Digest, page 260, section 22.) Their pay is $3 per day. (Ibid, page 279, section 115.) Their election service, the day of election.

Illinois: Register's fees, $2 per day; service, two days. (Statutes of 1873, chapter 46, section 145, page 563.) Special constables may be appointed to keep the peace at the polls at $2 per day. Judges and clerks get $3 per day.

New York: Inspectors, same as judges, are allowed only $2 per day. (Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 454, section 7. Ibid, section 217.) Inspectors have power to appoint electors to help preserve order; no compensation provided for. (Ibid, page 438, section 32.)

Indiana: Township trustee appoints two electors to act with him as judges; he is inspector. (Statutes of Indiana, by Davis, volume 1, page 437.) Pay, excused from working one day on road, and if not liable to work, seventy-five cents.

Iowa: Three judges of election in each precinct, appointed by the board of supervisors, two clerks, one the township clerk, and the other chosen by the judges of election. Constable to attend and preserve order; if he does not attend judges appoint one or more specially.

Maryland: Three judges, two clerks; day of election. Judges keep the peace. (Revised Code of Maryland, 1878, pages 44-46.)

Kentucky: Two judges and clerk, one sheriff; serve on election day; pay $2 per day. (General Statutes, page 392.)

Kansas: Township trustee and two justices of the peace judges; in cities, councilmen of the ward, three in number, are judges and shall appoint two clerks; free from arrest. (Page 419.)

Delaware: Judges and clerks; $4 per day. (Laws of Delaware, revised code, 1874, page 760.) Presiding officer to keep the peace; justices, collectors, and constables to attend. In Wilmington the mayor and aldermen perform these duties. (Ibid, page 104, sections 6 and 7.) Inspector and assessor elected; inspector, judge, and two others chosen; two clerks. (Ibid, page 119, sections 11-14.) Inspector's pay, $5 per day. (Ibid, page 760.)

South Carolina: (Revised Statutes, page 33, section 35.) Mayors and clerks of general elections receive $2 per day. Time limited to three days.

North Carolina: Officers are four judges and one registrar; registrar has fees—ten cents for copying each old name, twenty cents for each new one added. One day allowed him in which to correct lists Saturday preceding election.

Michigan: Township clerk, assessor, and alderman of each ward are the inspectors of election. (Compiled Laws of 1871, page 112.) Inspectors keep order, and are paid $1.50 per day. (Ibid, page 290, section 95, sub-section 1.) Registrars, by act of 1859, page 132, section 2, (after 1859,) have three days to perform their work. In cities the aldermen are registrars; in townships, supervisors, treasurer, and clerk of the township; pay, $3 per day, to be paid by city. (Ibid, page 149, section 27.) Minnesota, (Statutes of Minnesota, revision of 1866, page 54, section 2.) Supervisors of townships are judges of elections; town clerk, and some person of the opposite party appointed by the judges, are clerks. City council in all cities except Saint Paul and Rochester appoint in each city three judges. In Saint Paul aldermen act as judges, and appoint two clerks, (section 5.) Four days to correct their lists; $2 per day, (page 56, section 8.)

Maine: Aldermen in cities perform duties of supervisors; time, three days before election.—Wardens preside at wards. (Amendment to constitution of 1834.)—(Revised Statutes of 1871; applies to cities of over one thousand voters.) In smaller places the time is more limited; in town, to election day; pay, $1.50 per day. (Revised Statutes, 80, section 75.) Assessors act as judges, &c.

Pennsylvania: One judge and two inspectors are the officers; pay, $1.50 per day, except Philadelphia, where it is $2. (Brightly's Purdon's Digest, volume 1, page 541, section 7.) Assessors make up and correct lists; compelled to attend at elections; give information; pay, $1. (Ibid, 544, section 13.) Inspectors correct lists day of election. (Ibid, 549, section 46.) Overseers in Philadelphia appointed by common pleas court; namely, three on application of ten citizens. (Ibid, 563, section 247.) Time, five days. (Ibid, 576, section 216.) Constables to attend and preserve the peace (no pay provided) at the polls.

Vermont: No registration law. First constable presides; (Gen. Stats., 1862, page 38, section 9.) receives ballots; counts in conjunction with town clerk, selectmen, and justice of peace as are present, who also decide on qualifications. (Ibid, 40, section 18.)

Rhode Island: Town councils control registration lists and are paid $1 per day for their services. (R. S., page 77, sections 8 and 10.)

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FRYE. I have had no purpose since the beginning of this debate to discuss this pending question. I had not proposed to talk about it or to vote in relation to it in any way. But in the discussion this morning, and in the absence of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] made the statement very distinctly that this proposition now pending was a compromise offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] also, in the absence of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] made virtually the same statement when he said that this was an olive-branch held out to the other side by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio. And on our own side, in one or two instances, still in the absence of the gentleman from Ohio, the idea has been held out here that this is a proposition offered by the gentleman from Ohio as a compromise. I repeat it, in the presence of that gentleman, who is now here. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the grossest and gravest injustice has been done to the gentleman from Ohio in these assertions. He never offered this to the House as an olive-branch; he never offered it as a compromise. He never went any further than to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to ask a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Did not the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who is now in his seat and can answer for himself, at the last session state that he thought these special deputy marshals should be divided between the two parties?

Mr. McMAHON. He said so to me the day before yesterday.

Mr. FRYE. I will not undertake to answer for the gentleman from Ohio as to what he said.

Mr. SPARKS. I thought you had undertaken to answer for the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FRYE. I will not undertake to answer for the gentleman from Ohio as to what he said or did in the extra session. I am only speaking of what was said here to-day and during this discussion and since that amendment has been pending. I say the gentleman from Ohio has not offered this as a compromise. The statements of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] to that effect would mislead the country. This proposition came from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] and the only amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was an amendment proposed to improve the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois had offered. No man on this side, as I understand it, proposes to offer an amendment or to accept an amendment, or that an amendment or that a compromise or anything else shall be adopted or accepted on this appropriation bill, whatever they may propose when distinct and independent legislation is offered.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] does me an injustice in his statement of what I said. I said I advised my friends to accept the proposition or compromise tendered by the conservative gentleman from Ohio, as amended by my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. SIMONTON.] I did no man an injustice, and I beg to assure my friend I had no such intention.

Mr. FRYE. I misunderstood the gentleman, then. I wish to say I do not feel called upon to defend the gentleman from Ohio. I simply desired to state in his presence and hearing, he having been absent till this moment, what had been said or done on the floor of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the gentleman from Maine deny that in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, yesterday, was this clause:

Said special deputies to be appointed in equal numbers from the different political parties.

Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. FRYE. It was an amendment offered to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McMILLIN. Did the gentleman from Ohio not offer it?

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly. The RECORD will show that.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I renew the pro forma amendment. The issue between the two sides has been very much narrowed during the discussion to-day. This law is on the statute-book; many of us believe that it is unconstitutional. The effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is to take in part from that law a partisan administration of its provisions. It has been distinctly asserted on the other side by several who have addressed the House this morning that they will not be satisfied with any compromise or with any change of the existing law in these respects.

Mr. HAWLEY. On an appropriation bill. Appoint Monday next for the consideration of this matter, and discuss the election laws all next week if you choose, and we will be with you.

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman does not control that side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) We are ready to meet that issue. We say that if special deputy marshals are to be used at elections, whatever may be the opinion as to the constitutionality of such a law, those officers should be divided between the two or three political parties contending at such election. We say that when we come to vote the money to carry out such law we will not vote it to be used for any partisan purposes.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) We want the money to be used for no party ends whatever, but only for the purpose of carrying out the act which is on the statute-book, but which you declare it to be your purpose to administer as has been heretofore done.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman says "for no party end." Did not the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] stand here ten minutes ago and say that he did this for a party end, that they would take this now for the advantage which they could get from it, and afterward, having obtained that vantage-ground, they would sweep all the law from the statute-book? [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) In answer to the gentleman—

Mr. ROBESON. I accept that issue.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) One moment; I have the floor.

Mr. ROBESON. I beg pardon.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) In answer to the gentleman, allow me to say that I take no one man's word on this side of the House. I take the acts of the party who have the officers to execute this law in contradistinction to the words of anybody. You have administered this law in an outrageous and unjustifiable manner. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Not so.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) And in endeavoring to modify that law here to-day we do no more than to ask that it shall be made to exercise its powers upon all alike, and that those who administer the law shall be drawn from the great body of the people, without reference to party associations or affiliations. [Renewed applause on the democratic side.]

The friends of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] assert that he did not take the position during the extra session of this Congress which it has been said he took. I ask to have read what the gentleman proposed as an amendment to this very bill and what he said at the time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And I wish to have read in connection with that what the gentleman said when he offered his amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. We know what he said, and a great many of us would say the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read what has been sent up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARFIELD. I modify the substitute further by striking out the words "and general deputy marshals," as the amendment ought to relate to special deputies only.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to that modification.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to modify his own substitute.

Mr. FIELD. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to one point. The provision is that in the absence of the circuit judge these officers shall be appointed by the district judge.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FIELD. I suggest that the words "of the district" be inserted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I modify the amendment further by inserting after "district judge" the words "of the district."

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I ask the Clerk now to read the last two lines of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Said special deputies to be appointed in equal numbers from the different political parties.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Now let the paragraph be read which I had marked.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has expired, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to allow to be read the passage I have marked, not to be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not take it out of the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARFIELD. It is to strike out all after the words "in the absence of the circuit judge," where they occur in the last line of the RECORD print, page 39. I speak for nobody but myself, but I will vote for the amendment if all following these words be struck out.

Mr. FINLEY. That was on yesterday.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It was.

Mr. GARFIELD. We are equals here, each having rights equal to every other, and nobody having any authority to bind any but himself. With that preface, I will speak for myself.

The first object which I try to keep before my mind in legislation is to be right. And on this question of the election laws, during the long and heated session of debate last summer, in which all sorts of accusations were made against them by gentlemen on the other side, there was made but one lodgment in my mind of a just criticism upon them. There was one charge made by the other side, and in so far as it was true I consider it a just objection to the law. It was that the law had been used, or was capable of being used, to fill election precincts with men of one party whose time might be employed at the public expense for party electioneering purposes.

I say in so far as that law can be so used to that extent it is unjust; and at all times and on all proper occasions I have declared, and I now declare myself, willing to modify the law so that the alleged abuse cannot take place. [Applause on the democratic side.] That I say for myself, and will continue to say it. No other valid objection to this law was, in my judgment, made by anybody during the last session of this Congress or since.

Now, what has happened? In the first place on this side we objected and do still object, with entire unanimity, to riders on appropriation bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Yes; but you said yesterday that you would vote for this as a rider.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will "possess his soul in patience." We did all in our power to prevent any rider; but the rider was ruled in order. What then? I hold it always to be my duty to help make a pending measure as decent and harmless as possible, and then we can and doubtless will vote against its final adoption because it is a rider. Yesterday, distinctly disclaiming the right to speak for anybody but myself, I offered a substitute for the proposed amendment, by providing that the special deputy marshals having their fair pay at $5 a day should be appointed by the courts, and equally from the political parties, so as to prevent the only evil that could be justly complained of. I will vote to substitute that for the pending proposition, if I vote alone on either or both sides of the House. [Applause on the democratic side.]

But what has been done? Gentlemen on the other side not only did not accept my substitute but voted it down, and substituted for it a proposition containing these provisions: First, that the compensation of these deputy marshals shall be cut down to $2 a day; second, that there shall never be more than three of them in any one election precinct; and, third, that they shall not be employed more than three days, even though the registration under the law of the State lasts ten days. Now, what does this mean? It means that under the pretense of enforcing the election law for scrutinizing and guarding the polls, though there may be a thousand rioters around the polls seeking to break up the election, yet there shall be but three men empowered to keep the peace of the United States against the mob. In other words, the pending amendment proposes to make this law a notice in advance to the mob to come and overwhelm the keepers of the peace and make hell, rather than order, reign and rule at our national elections. If this were a part of the best bill in the world, I would not vote for it, because it cuts the vitals out of the law and makes its enforcement an impossibility.

But if you will take the naked proposition that I offered, I will vote for it as a substitute, if I vote alone. I will vote for it as a betterment of the pending amendment, though I say again that it is not proper to put it on an appropriation bill; it is altogether improper. But when an amendment is pending I will vote for the betterment of it. I did not offer my substitute as a compromise. On the question of what I believe just and right I make no compromise anywhere; but I do believe that it strengthens the election law to free it from every ground of charge that it is partisan or can be used for merely partisan purposes. I want the law to insure, so far as law can do it, fair, honest, and peaceable elections, and I want it for no other purpose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I withdraw the pro forma amendment. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] whether his understanding of the law is that the special deputy marshals have anything to do with the registration.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; in every State where a registration is required by the law.

A MEMBER. The supervisors of election attend to the registration.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; the supervisors have charge of scrutinizing the registration, but the special deputy marshals are by law ordered to protect the supervisors in the execution of their duties; and the protection should go with the scrutiny.

Mr. McLANE. That is not in the election law.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I am not sure, but I think the gentleman from Ohio is mistaken.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no; the language is specific.

Mr. REED. The language of the law defining the duties of the marshal and his deputies is that they shall "preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls."

Mr. HISCOCK. I read from section 2022:

The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, it was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that this side of the House had objected to the proposition in all its features. I offered to interrupt him at the time to say I had expressly stated that whenever this proposition was presented as a sole substantive proposition it would have my hearty support.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I did not hear the gentleman's speech; but I heard enough. I heard the echo and the response to the sentiment uttered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I withdrew it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. McLANE. As was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL] the issue in this debate has very much narrowed. There is now no longer any such question at issue as was made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] distinguishing between the original bill and a rider to an appropriation bill. The subject before the committee for consideration is the appropriation bill, and the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, on my right, is an amendment to this appropriation bill. It is, therefore, the appropriation bill prepared, reported, and perfected in pursuance of the rules of this House, and the gentleman from Ohio has well explained, whatever might be his opinion as to the propriety of legislating in this manner, he felt it to be his duty to make the proposition embraced in the bill as reasonable as he could.

Now, whatever may be the differences of opinion here, however unwilling some gentlemen on this side of the House may be to accept these supervisors and marshals and deputy marshals under these election laws, or however resolute may be the determination of gentlemen on that side to admit of no amendment at all to these laws as they now exist, or to agree to any compromise whatever on this question, and however much compromise may be repelled and despised by gentlemen on that side, the issue is nevertheless a compromise as it is presented in the pending amendment. And as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] on his side is willing to take the marshals in equal numbers from the parties engaged at the polls, so the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] on this side has avowed his willingness to accept such an arrangement and such an adjustment, and the other gentleman from Ohio on this side, who reported the bill, [Mr. McMAHON,] concurs in the same view of the question.

I, for one, do not feel I subordinate in any degree my opposition to the election laws as a whole as well as in detail, if I also take that compromise. I recognize perfectly well that the law has been adjudicated to be a constitutional law, and I am perfectly at liberty to think of the court as the gentleman from New York thinks of the court, yet it is not less my duty to respect the mandate of the court and accept its adjudication of questions arising under these laws, whether it be a bad court or not, whether it be a court entitled to my confidence and respect or not.

And this is certainly not the place for me to declare my opinion as regards the partisan character of that court. I want to say that, maintaining my own opinion of the court and of the law, and leaving to all others their opinion of the court and the law, I am at perfect liberty to denounce the law as vicious and inexpedient and unnecessary, although it may be constitutional. A law that is vile and vicious in its details may yet be a constitutional law. The powers of this Government are express, and it is within the power of Congress, in exercising perfectly legitimate power, to pass a law odious and tyrannical and deserving of the scorn of every freeman in the country. And, for one, I believe the election law to be just such a law. And the gentleman from Ohio well said when he listened to this debate that he could not resist the appeal which was made that this law, although constitutional, was believed to be capable of abuse, capable of being prostituted to partisan purposes, and his colleague on this side of the House said he thought it his duty to do all in his power to take away from the law these odious features; and I for one shall co-operate with him to my utmost to take away from that law its bad features, although I may not be able at this time to repeal it altogether. Thus a point of compromise is reached between those who have heretofore sustained and those who have heretofore opposed the law as it now exists. Conceding its constitutionality—that is, conceding the adjudication of questions arising under it by the Supreme Court—its inexpediency, its partisan and tyrannical character, remain, and I feel perfectly justified in offering every possible opposition to its execution and in exerting my utmost effort to change and modify its odious features. If these efforts are properly met by gentlemen on the other side, I feel an obligation resting upon me to yield what is necessary to meet an adjustment which will render possible the execution of the law. If no such adjustment is secured, then various questions might be adjudicated arising under the law; and however much these particular adjudications might be respected by me when individually encountered, I would continue my opposition to the law as earnestly and as uncompromisingly as if its constitutionality had not been adjudicated by the Supreme Court, for its inexpediency and vicious partisan character remain intact to render it odious and hateful.

[Here the member fell.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, we stand to-day it seems just where we stood for three months and more than three months last spring. The democrats on that side of the House are determined to put on even a deficiency appropriation bill the worst and most objectionable riders which have ever been proposed. Notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court, which took away a part of their argument during the extra session, the democrats to-day stand in their places and assert that they will not be bound by the decision of the Supreme Court. We do not expect them to be. Past experience would not warrant us in the belief they would be bound by the decision of the Supreme Court.

A gentleman representing another party in part here, says that beneath the ermine the fires are still burning of political partisanship and political hate. Why should gentlemen who can make such expressions, yield any respect to the decision of the highest tribunal of the country?

But, sir, it is a gratification to me to see that under the leadership of the Speaker of this House, under a leadership which controlled his party and held them together with a hand of steel for two months of the last session of the last Congress and for three months of the extra session of this Congress, that that leadership is relaxing, that that hand of steel is opening, that the Speaker tells his followers to-day they are at liberty to give up the assertion of their rights and put political riders on appropriation bills; that they are at liberty to give up their assertion that these election laws were unconstitutional; and more than that, were infamous. This astute leader of the democratic party rises in his place and tells his followers they were all wrong, as we said they were all wrong, and as he heard the country say they were all wrong during the three months of the extra session. Now the cry goes up save yourselves who can, scatter, divide, take a compromise coming from the gentleman from Ohio. Do anything, as the other gentleman from Ohio said, to escape what he feels burdening his shoulders to-day with the condemnation of the American people.

So, sir, I do not wonder that the counsels of the democracy are disorganized. I do not wonder that the leader of the democracy is compelled to tell his followers, "We will not only admit the election laws were right and constitutional and proper, but if we can get a little political advantage in the execution of these laws, it is right and proper for the great democracy 'to go back' upon its entire record and accept the laws modified for their purposes."

The exhibition is remarkable. If it were not serious it would be laughable. If it were not for the great veneration I have for the Speaker of the House; if it were not that I look forward with some anxiety to the high hopes he entertains of administering all the laws, I could treat this as a little comedy, as a little by-play—this performance here of the head of his party to-day. Is it in effect that hereafter he hopes to control all the officers in the execution of these election laws, that he tells his followers to-day that they had better let them remain until they get into his hands? Did he mean not only to direct the appointment of the marshals, but appoint all of the other officers and bring the whole paraphernalia of the marshals service to the support of the democratic party? Why, I ask, this change of front in the midst of battle?

Mr. SPRINGER. We keep marching on. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMAHON. I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. There is now pending a pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. McLANE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. McMAHON. I propose an amendment to strike out all after the appropriation of $7,600 and insert the following words, which are taken from the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order at this time unless it be offered as a substitute.

Mr. McMAHON. I offer it in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is made to amend the substitute by striking out all after the word "provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have just put in all of that by vote. Mr. SPRINGER. Oh no; that part inserted by the committee is lower down. The modification here is to strike out all after the word "provided;" or rather to incorporate the word "provided," and let the amendment remain as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PAGE. Do I understand the Chair to say it is in order to introduce that at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order as an amendment to the proposed substitute.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to oppose that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed has not yet been read, and nobody has advocated it. It will be in order after it is read and advocated.

Mr. McMAHON. I ask that the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "provided," and insert as follows:

That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections, for performing any duties in reference to any election, shall receive the sum of $5 per day in full for their compensation; and that all appointments of such special deputy marshals shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the district judge in the absence of the circuit judge; said special deputies to be appointed in equal numbers from the different political parties.

Mr. McMAHON. I think the committee will bear me witness that having charge of this bill I endeavored to shut off debate at the earliest possible moment, and that I sought to prevent the political debate which my friend from Connecticut deprecates, but which was inaugurated by my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is mistaken. We do not deprecate debate; we rather court it on this subject.

Mr. McMAHON. There is no accounting for gentlemen's taste who like pickles. If the gentleman is pleased, we are. I assert that my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] inaugurated it. Time was given him for discussion when I tried to close debate. He came in with a prepared speech, endeavoring to place us in a false position. I undertook to reply in my feeble way. In the course of that argument, repudiating the interpretation the gentleman had put upon my speech, I said we desired a modification of the election laws; that, if constitutional, they were not good laws; that if they were modified we might vote money in the future for the purpose of carrying them out. Thereupon my colleague from the State of Ohio said to me on the floor that he had offered a proposition to appoint these marshals, by the court, from all parties at the last session, and that—

While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return.

And that the lamp was still burning, and he was ready to modify them. We acted on his words. We took it as an offer of compromise in good faith.

Mr. HASKELL. You did not come back.

Mr. McMAHON. We did, but you repudiated us. Your stalwart men shout, "No compromise!" We acted on my colleague's offer, made on Wednesday last. The Committee on Elections met next morning and agreed upon the amendment, now pending, of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER], who brought it into the House and offered it under the rules, as he had a right to do. We thought when the offer contained in this amendment was made to gentlemen on that side it would be accepted. But it seems to be objectionable in various ways, especially in limiting the number of deputies who may be appointed.

The amendment I have just now offered, which I hope our friends on this side will accept without dissent, as well as gentlemen on the other, is precisely the amendment of my colleague from the State of Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD], offered yesterday in the House, without the crossing of a t or the dotting of an i, which proposition he has always said he will support, and which he has just now said he will vote for "if no other man does."

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMAHON. If it is not to come out of my time.

Mr. BURROWS. Suppose on the morning of election you want to appoint deputy marshals and the judge is one hundred miles away, or in the middle of the afternoon there is a threatened disturbance, what are you going to do?

Mr. SPRINGER. The law makes provision for that.

Mr. McMAHON. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Michigan. Suppose a marshal of the United States under the present law lives a hundred miles away and there is disturbance on election day, what are you going to do? The marshals are no more convenient than the judges. The gentleman himself will see there is nothing in his objection. The amendment provides for that contingency as well as the existing law. Now, we want, as the Speaker has very well said already, anything that looks to an amendment of these laws to go hand in hand with the appropriation for carrying them out. It should be in the nature of a compromise. It is not right for gentlemen on the other side to say to us, "vote this money, and we will amend the law hereafter." That amendment may never come; it certainly would not come until after the next congressional election.

Mr. CONGER. Is not the money going to these marshals?

Mr. McMAHON. If you incorporate this provision, you will have a proper ground to go upon to ask us to give you appropriation hereafter.

Mr. CONGER. But none of this money goes to pay the marshals in the future.

Mr. McMAHON. This goes to pay a past obligation, I admit; or what is supposed to be an obligation.

Mr. ROBESON. Do I understand the gentleman to say for himself and his party that if this amendment should be voted on the bill they would stand committed to vote the money needed for the payment of special marshals always in the future?

Mr. McMAHON. I will vote, so far as I am concerned, and I can only speak for myself, all the money that in my judgment will be properly needed to carry out the law.

Mr. ROBESON. Ah!

Mr. McMAHON. Does the gentleman want me to vote on his judgment? Certainly he would not be so unreasonable. To do so I would have to be made over, and surrender my constituency to some one they did not elect. I can only vote on my own judgment; and my responsibility in the exercise of that is of equal weight, or ought to be, with that of any other gentleman. My constituents sent me here to exercise my own judgment. And I can only say to gentlemen that I will exercise it fairly.

Mr. Chairman, let us close this debate as soon as possible. I want this bill to go through as quickly as possible and to be passed to-day. I sympathize with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] in his energetic remarks that it is really an act of charity not to delay any longer. Its delay is keeping $3,500 a day out of the pockets of a hard-working and needy class of this community, and depriving many worthy people of employment. I hope it will pass without delay, and I wish to say to gentlemen on the other side that I thought it cruel when they voted unanimously to enter upon a political discussion which has brought on all these delays and entanglements.

Mr. VALENTINE. Strike out your riders and we will pass the bill.

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the leader on that side of the House, the acknowledged leader—and I say to gentlemen that they will find it would have been well for them to have learned from him instead of fighting him here—said that this was a law which had been misused. The gentleman said that in his seat, and after a solemn protest from his party against his proposition for a compromise and amendment of the law.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman did not say there had been such a thing as an abuse of the law, but that there might be.

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman from Ohio said it might have been abused in the past, and that it was certainly capable of abuse. He made an open confession, as he has frequently done before, that the law is not fair, and should be amended. He said so just now. Vote him down, if you want to do so; vote down the man whose intellect and honesty has compelled him to make this admission. Who stands higher in your ranks than he does? And do you object to doing a fair thing because it is a "rider"? Where would it be more appropriate than on just such a bill as this? Upon his honest admission that these election laws are not fair and should be amended we will go to the country; and that there may be no mistake about our position we will, on this side, adopt the amendment of my honorable colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and modify these election laws only in the very way he has pointed out they should be. Certainly no fairer proposition could be made; and on that we will go to the country.

Mr. COX. I am for all riders on bills to repeal the bad rider legislation of republicanism. I use that term republicanism in its petty party sense, and not in its nobler meaning. There never was on our statute-book a meaner instrument for the purposes of tyranny, to torture free suffrage, than this law under discussion. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] confessed this, when he confessed it to be a partisan measure.

Mr. GARFIELD. What does the gentleman say?

Mr. COX. That the gentleman from Ohio—meaning you—said that there was a lodgment in your mind—a lodgment—

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

Mr. COX. That the worst feature of this election law happened to be—that it was charged and used for partisan purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Charged and capable of being used. That is what I said.

Mr. CLYMER. Let that stand.

Mr. COX. I will let that stand. It is all I want.

Now, a law of this kind is proposed to be repealed or at least modified. Our friends on this side, with a good deal of suavity and in the spirit of "compromise," which I would like to share, if I could, have tendered the very proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, in haec verba—the gentlemen on that side understand Greek. [Laughter.] And yet when anything of that kind is tendered, gentlemen like the member from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] get red in the face in howling "no compromise."

Can we believe in the sincerity of gentlemen on that side about any compromise? Would they carry out even the suave proposition made by the gentleman from Ohio and accepted by some on this side?

Mr. HAWLEY. You desire to repeal the whole of it.

Mr. COX. I never disguised that; and all the salt and sanctity of the opposition cannot long save it. Gentlemen, in the language of Shakespeare, may

With devotion's visage,
And pious action, * * * sugar o'er
The devil himself.

[Laughter.]

But that cannot save them from deep damnation in the end.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] yesterday, in answering what I said about the Supreme Court, intimated, in a speech that was mazy with misty rhetoric and flimsy logic, about falsehoods and lies, &c., that we were bound to obey the Supreme Court decision as the supreme law of the land. No, sir; that is not our duty. General Jackson at least did not think he was bound by the opinion of the Supreme Court; not on the United States Bank charter. When the court decided it to be constitutional he vetoed the act. The Supreme Court can bind no tribunal except its subordinate courts.

Mr. GARFIELD. Had the Supreme Court decided that President Jackson should not veto the bank bill?

Mr. COX. They had decided that the creation of a United States bank was constitutional.

Mr. GARFIELD. But not that the President should not veto the bill.

Mr. COX. General Jackson swore by the Eternal that he would not sign any such moneyed franchise, even if they thought it were constitutional. That oath has eternized him in the democratic heart and mind. He defied the Supreme Court. He held that it had its own functions, and by a stronger reason Congress is at least coequal and co-ordinate if not superior to its creature, the court. The Supreme Court has no power over Congress in these legislative matters.

Does my friend from Ohio remember the fugitive-slave law?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, and the Dred Scott decision, too.

Mr. COX. And the Dred Scott decision. Would he have voted here to carry out the Dred Scott opinion by legislation, or the fugitive-slave law by voting money for slave-catchers? No! I ask him to answer that question, he who is so sincere. Would any of you gentlemen have voted money to carry out by appropriations the fugitive-slave law after the Supreme Court decided it to be constitutional? You are dumb!

Mr. HAWLEY. I said here on the floor, before the gentleman came in, that there was no power on earth that could force me to move hand or foot to carry out that law.

Mr. COX. You are only one man, though a very great one.

Mr. HAWLEY. How many do you want on the floor at once?

Mr. COX. I have no doubt there are some divided sentiments on that side. But to come back to the Dred Scott decision and the fugitive-slave law. Does it lie on the part of gentlemen to talk about obeying the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as supreme law, binding Congress? Do I not remember when processions came from the district of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] Did they not meet in Cleveland in the "peeled stick" convention, all armed and ready to resist the authority of the United States? Do I not remember when the State authorities were arrayed against its execution; when men were arrested and when arms were provided and war was imminent; when gentlemen of the "Reserve" moved through the streets of Cleveland singing the Marseillaise through their noses? [Laughter.] I remember that they defied the law in spite of supreme courts. And would those partisans then have voted money to carry out that law? No! Yet they now pretend to reproach us for having our independent opinion on this subject, notwithstanding the same tribunal, on a subject kindred, in which liberty is shackled and free voting hindered, harassed, and suppressed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HERBERT. One thing I want to say—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order. An amendment to an amendment is now pending, and must be withdrawn or disposed of before any other amendment is in order.

Many MEMBERS. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendment proposed to the pending substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after "$7,600" and insert:
Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections for performing any duties in reference to any election shall receive the sum of $5 per day in full for their compensation; and that all appointments of such special deputy marshals shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the district judge in the absence of the circuit judge; said special deputies to be appointed in equal numbers from the different political parties.

Mr. McMAHON. It is to be observed that the appropriation of $7,600 is still included in the substitute.

Mr. GARFIELD. We will have to vote separately on the money part, on the demand of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask to have read a bill which I offered in the House, and which is so much better guarded than the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, that I think he will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is one offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Let my bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to reading the bill referred to? Several members objected.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the question is upon the amendment to the substitute.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the substitute was agreed to upon a division—ayes 106, noes 53.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the substitute as amended.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I would like to offer a further amendment; to add that which I send to the Clerk's desk, and which is a portion of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SIMONTON.]

The Clerk read as follows:

And the persons so appointed shall be persons of good character, able to read and write the English language, and shall be well-known residents of the voting precincts in which their duties are to be performed.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I think the amendment I have offered and just read is right. If we are to have marshals we ought to have intelligent men.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that amendment will be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I hope the other side will accept this amendment. If we are to have marshals at all we ought to have intelligent men, men who are able to read and write, for they are to scrutinize figures, to see that additions are correct, and generally to see that no fraud is committed on paper or through the window.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman think that special deputies have anything to do with scrutinizing the election returns?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, the registration lists.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, I think not.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) This amendment should be adopted on the broad principle of getting the best men to perform this duty.

Mr. KEIFER. That is another thing.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think one effect of the amendment of the gentleman will be that in portions of the country where the majority of the voters are colored men, if the reading-and-writing qualification is required, you might not be able to get a sufficient number of persons to do the work. I am not willing to put anything in the law that will have that effect.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that the colored people of the South are being educated. There is a great improvement in that respect, and I do not believe that there is a voting precinct in a southern city where you cannot secure colored men who can read and write the English language. Let us do justice to the South in that particular.

Mr. GARFIELD. The requirement seems to me unnecessarily restrictive.

Mr. FORT. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if his amendment is to prevail, to which I have no objection, the word "moral" should be inserted before the word "character."

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I accept that modification.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment of my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] would in the most necessitous cases defeat the execution of the law. If the deputy marshals are to be selected from the particular election district in which they are to operate, then, when a large number may be required at any particular point to suppress a riot and preserve the peace, the force would be inadequate. The object of that amendment obviously is—

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) My experience is that these officers generally make the riot. They did in a part of my district.

Mr. BAYNE. It has been repeatedly said here that these officers have occasioned riots. It has been repeatedly said that in Philadelphia men of bad character have been appointed deputy marshals—burglars, highwaymen, men who kept saloons and other improper places. But it should be borne in mind that that portion of the republican party was the only portion that was intimately acquainted with the democratic party, and consequently able to detect frauds, to know repeaters, and to prevent imposition on the ballot-box. [Laughter.] It should also be borne in mind that two democratic Senators, [Messrs. McDONALD and GARLAND,] who were on the sub-committee that investigated this matter, have stated in a letter addressed to Hon. WILLIAM A. WALLACE, who had sent to the sub-committee all the testimony taken, that Marshal Kerns's conduct on election day was not censurable in view of the duties imposed upon him by law, and their judgment was that those duties were neither vindictively nor illegally performed. They said that the objections to him were purely political, and they recommended the confirmation of his reappointment.

Mr. Chairman, viewed in its relation to the enforcement of the laws, the amendment dividing the deputy marshals between the political parties should not be adopted. As a matter of diplomacy, however, perhaps as a matter of politics, it might be very well to adopt it. For if it should become a part of the law, and the democratic party should have the prospect before it of getting one-half of the deputy marshals at $5 a day, these election laws now so obnoxious to that party, now regarded by that party as unconstitutional and dangerous to the liberties of the people, would soon lose their terrors and meet with the approbation of that party. These election laws embody a great stride in national progress; they are active factors in working out our national existence. If we can ingratiate them into the favor of the democratic party, it might be wise to do so even at some expense.

I venture to say that if we enable the democratic party to get the offices and the fees, you will hear nothing more about the unconstitutionality of these laws. The offices and the emoluments will overcome all scruples.

So, I say, as a matter of diplomacy, as a matter of good management by the republican party in securing the acceptance of these laws by the democratic party, it might be a good idea to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. I think, however, such advantages are overborne by weightier considerations. One is, that the party in power should administer the Government, and not the minority. Another is, that it would give a partisan character to the officers of the law. If a riot should occur, it would be quite likely that democratic deputy marshals would sympathize with their party friends, and under such circumstances it would be but natural that republican deputies should stand by their friends. In that aspect of the matter, it would often be impossible to fairly execute the laws. Leave the whole responsibility, however, in the hands of the party in power, whichever it may be, and it will be found that this sense of responsibility will lead to the best attainable results.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Mr. Chairman, I desire to modify my amendment. I am appealed to by some members, who say that in some of the election divisions there are colored people who cannot read and write, and also by many gentlemen who, having German constituents, say that this requirement of reading and writing the English language might interfere with the appointment of Germans. I do not think there is much in the objection, yet I wish unanimity, and I therefore modify the amendment by striking out the words "able to read and write the English language," leaving the requirement that these officers must be men of good moral character and must also be well-known residents of the election district in which they are appointed. I would like to have the amendment read as now modified.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman will allow me to suggest cases may arise in a precinct, a riot being in progress and great excitement, that it would be desirable to have peace officers not acquainted in the precinct and not partaking of the local prejudices or excitement, and it might be difficult to find parties in the particular precinct who would be competent to act.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no election precinct in the United States where there are not enough honest men to act as peace-officers. I ask for the reading of the amendment as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as the committee comes to order, the amendment as modified will be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I ask gentlemen to note it as it is read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the persons so appointed shall be persons of good moral character and shall be well-known residents of the voting precincts in which their duties are to be performed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania this modification to his amendment: that instead of using the word "character," it shall read "that these shall be persons of good repute and able to read and write."

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I have left out the words "to read and write."

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania accept that.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I want the man who is appointed to come up to the requirements of a good moral character in the community in which he is to act.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is true; and the language I suggest will carry out that purpose better than the language now contained in the amendment. As the gentleman refuses to accept it, I move to strike out the word "character," and in lieu thereof to insert "of good repute."

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Repute is one man's opinion of another and does not accomplish the purpose I seek.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "character" and insert "repute;" and I desire to say a word on that amendment. I wish to make it clear and practical. As it is now it is simply farcical to provide these persons shall be of good moral character. A man's character is really what he is, and it is somewhat difficult to determine what is his moral character.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The court can do that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. One moment, if you please. To appoint a man of good repute in his neighborhood, who is esteemed and respected by his fellow-citizens as an upright citizen, is what this law demands. The other expression is chimerical and ridiculous; you do not find it in the law anywhere. Good repute is the language of the statutes everywhere. Now, I wish to perfect this law, and for that reason I suggest it as an amendment, and for no other reason, as I desire to make the provision thoroughly practical.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. Is this amendment just moved in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order at this stage of the proceedings, because there is an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. HOOKER. I object, then, to the reception of the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us have the question, then.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question; his five minutes are not all up.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I ask whether or not, in the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio, it is in order for the republican party to undertake to amend this political proposition when it is, no doubt, the purpose of that party, or nine-tenths of them, to vote against any proposition containing any clause whatever in the nature of a rider upon an appropriation bill?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will answer my friend frankly. I believe in amending and perfecting every measure submitted to this House, although I may in the end vote against it. If it is to become a law I desire to see it freed from every possible objection, if that can be accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOOKER. Let the amendment be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I cannot understand the rule which gags a man when he has something to say. [Laughter.] I have as much right to speak as the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment under the rule.

Mr. RANDALL's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. This now, I believe, is the modified substitute for the proposition I offered on yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Have I now the right to accept this for the proposition I then offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman who offered the amendment not yet voted on has the right to modify it by accepting this in its place.

Mr. CONGER. But this has been amended.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, yes; this has been amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's proposition has not been amended and he proposes now to accept this in lieu of his.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman's proposition was amended.

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; this is a proposed substitute.

Mr. CONGER. The RECORD will show differently.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Appropriations reported a proposition to the House which was ordered to be printed and recommended. That contained no appropriation for marshals at all. When the Committee on Appropriations reported it back to the House, it did so with a proposed amendment making an appropriation of $600,000 to pay the marshals and their general deputies. To that proposition the gentleman from Illinois offered an amendment appropriating $7,600 to pay special deputy marshals of elections with a certain proviso. For that amendment, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] offered a substitute and on that the committee has been acting ever since, not having touched yet the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair will remember that the gentleman from Illinois offered a further amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Therefore there was an amendment pending, and an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is so.

Mr. CONGER. This has been amended, and the amendment is still pending to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. Therefore he cannot accept that proposed amendment and cannot make it a substitute for anything which has already been amended by the committee. And I submit that if I have an amendment which I have offered, I have a right to vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of course, and if the gentleman has any other amendment pending to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, he has the right to vote upon it.

Mr. CONGER. There is an amendment, as the RECORD will show.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not differ with the gentleman as to the facts. There is now pending before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union an amendment in the form of a proposed substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. Now the gentleman from Illinois proposes (his amendment not having been acted on at all) to accept this proposed substitute in lieu of it.

Mr. CONGER. He might, of course, but for the fact that there is pending another amendment other than his own, and for which he has no right to accept any other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Illinois accepts the amendment to that portion of his amendment which he himself introduced and which is pending.

Mr. CONGER. But the other amendment is entirely a different proposition and how can he accept a substitute for that?

Mr. SPRINGER. My amendment will be still subject to amendment.

Mr. CONGER. How can he prevent a vote on the other amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He cannot prevent a vote upon it, but he can accept an amendment proposed in lieu of his own proposition. Then the question is on the adoption of the proposition as amended, and that of course has to be determined by the committee.

Mr. CONGER. If he accepts or if he could accept that amendment, therefore, there would be still pending that original amendment which has been undisposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it?

Mr. CONGER. It is the amendment to the gentleman's original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. But he proposes to accept that. If he agrees to it he accepts it as a modification of his original proposition of course.

Mr. CONGER. But I say there is another amendment that is pending even in that case.

Mr. SPRINGER. If I have accepted this amendment, it is still the pending amendment.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair, however, will observe from the RECORD that the amendment to which I refer, under the ruling of the Chair, is still pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to be right about this matter, and hopes the gentleman will state the exact point.

Mr. HAYES. There is no amendment to Mr. SPRINGER's amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

Mr. KEIFER. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois accepts what has been proposed in lieu of his own amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is what he proposes to do, but the gentleman from Michigan insists he has no right to do it. Of course it is understood that he cannot accept it so as to make it a part of the bill. It is still open for the action of the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. I give notice that if he accepts that amendment I will make the point of order against it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I desire to ask whether in the judgment of the gentleman from Illinois the election laws would be constitutional if his amendment was adopted?

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote on the pending proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. If I can have ten minutes, I would like to answer the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to rule correctly on this, and if he is mistaken he desires to be put right.

Mr. CONGER. In response to the desire of the Chair to be placed right on this matter, I find on page 30 of the RECORD this statement:

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the Committee on Appropriations has reported back this bill, recommending the adoption of an amendment making an appropriation of $600,000 to pay marshals and their general deputies. To that amendment the gentleman from Illinois has proposed an amendment. Therefore not only an amendment, but an amendment to the amendment, is now pending; and at present no further amendment is in order under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. But if the gentleman will look further on in the course of the proceedings, he will find the Chair rules under the peculiar practice of this House, which is different from the general parliamentary law, that notwithstanding the fact there was an amendment pending and an amendment to the amendment in the ordinary form, still the substitute might be pending at the same time, and thereupon the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] offered this substitute.

Mr. FIELD. I move to strike out the last word.

I am one of those who will not vote to put political riders on appropriation bills. I am also one of those who will vote to perfect proposed amendments, even although I may ultimately vote against them. One objection to these political riders is that they are almost always crude; and I think every proposition that has been submitted here is a crude proposition, ill-considered, and not adapted to the existing state of the law.

The law is that the circuit court, on the application of two citizens, where there are cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward, shall be open for ten days preceding an election; that supervisors shall be appointed by the circuit judge; that if for any cause the circuit judge cannot act he may designate a district judge within his circuit, who shall act in his place. The proceedings are of record in the circuit court.

In regard to marshals, the provision is that two citizens may apply to the marshal for the appointment of special deputies, and that general deputies and special deputies shall perform the duties in reference to elections, and general deputies are appointed by the marshal himself.

Now, look at this amendment. I agree that special deputy marshals should be appointed by the court. I agree that they should be persons of different political parties. I agree they should be intelligent persons of good repute, and I think, as they have warrants in the English language in their hands, they should be able to read and write the English language.

But if you are to put the authority for the appointment of special deputy marshals in the courts you ought to put it in the same court, as has the authority for the appointment of supervisors. What, then, is the amendment? It is that the circuit judge shall act if he be present, but if he be absent the district judge of the district shall act in the appointment of special deputy marshals. What is the provision in regard to supervisors? That the circuit judge shall act if he can; but if for any cause, by reason of absence or otherwise, he cannot act, then not necessarily the district judge of the district, but a district judge within the circuit assigned by the circuit judge to the performance of that duty, shall in place of the circuit judge appoint supervisors, and this is a proceeding in the circuit court. Under this amendment the appointment of special deputy marshals in the absence of the circuit judge becomes of record in the district court, if it is of record anywhere, while the appointment of supervisors, whether by the circuit judge or by the assigned district judge, is in the circuit court; and thus a different district judge in a different court may have the appointment of one, and not of the other.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Both courts are open to the public.

Mr. FIELD. There is no provision that the district court shall be open ten days before the election. There is a provision that the circuit court shall be open. But if the district judge is to act in the appointment of special deputy marshals, there is no provision that he shall keep his court open or be in attendance.

Take another consideration to show the incongruity and ill-considered character of this proposition. As the law is now, the marshal makes the appointment of special deputy marshals on the application of two citizens. But this is a provision that the court or district judge shall appoint special deputies; but it is not said whether he shall appoint on application of two citizens or without any application. It is not clearly made the duty of either judge to act at all.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It is said the judge shall appoint, not the court.

Mr. FIELD. There is nothing in the provision from which any lawyer can certainly tell whether such a district judge in the appointment of special deputy marshals shall act on his own volition merely or upon the written application of two citizens, or whether he acts as judge of the district court or as a mere person designated to act. No statute is expressly repealed; implied repeals are not favored, and the provision may be cumulative or it may not be.

Then take the provision as to general deputies appointed by the marshals. It is said that for the purpose contemplated in this amendment they must be appointed by the court. If this be so, then a general deputy appointed by the marshal will not be able to execute a warrant in which a violation of the election laws is charged. But this cannot be so.

The truth is, these election laws in some respects need amendment; but they need well-considered amendments, adapted to other provisions, and they ought to be incorporated in an independent bill reported under the authority of some committee.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I oppose the amendment.

Our friends on the other side, who all during the extra session and up to the present time denounced the election laws as unconstitutional, come to the conclusion all at once when they get half of the marshals that the law is all right. Now, sir, for one I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts; I am opposed to anything here except to vote to pay these marshals whom we owe the money that we owe them. Let your rider go until some more appropriate time.

For my part, I am not here now to perfect an election law. I am not going to say whether I would at the proper time favor this measure or any other concerning the election laws. I am opposed to everything that looks to a repeal of the law or a modification of it upon this bill. What we have to do and ought to do is to pay the marshals a debt we owe them, and which we ought to have paid in the early part of the session.

Look for a moment at the singular attitude of gentlemen on the other side. They sustain their position first by nullifying the law. I ask our friends of the other side what act of Congress will you obey if you will not obey this? Upon whom are the acts of Congress binding if not upon the men here who make the laws? What right have you to discriminate what acts of Congress you will live up to and what you will disobey? It seems to me we must obey the laws as we find them on the statute-book, as Congress made them, or else we cannot ask anybody anywhere to obey them.

The other ground which gentlemen on the other side take is that they will nullify the decisions of the courts. Why, sir, there has been nothing since this debate began but swearing at the court on the part of the democratic lawyers in the House. They go before the court and argue their causes there, and are treated by the court with respect, and then they come into this House and denounce the court in unmeasured language.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No, sir. They remind me of the lawyer in Allegany County, New York, who, if he got beaten in a cause, would go to the tavern, drink whisky, and swear at the court. Now, our friends do not drink whisky, of course, [laughter,] but they swear at the court, and we have heard nothing from them but swearing at the court since this debate began. These gentlemen who repudiate the acts of Congress also repudiate the decisions of the court. No statute and no decision can restrain them.

The first thing they did in the extra session was to trample under foot the supreme court of what they called a sovereign State. The question came up here as to who was entitled to a certain seat in this House for the State of Florida. The democratic majority of this House repudiated the judgment of the supreme court of that State, which established the title of a certain gentleman to a seat in this House by evidence as plain and irrefragable as the demonstration of the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid; and they seated a man who was not elected.

What happened a few days later, under the inspiration of the doctrines of the majority on this floor? A gentleman of the democratic party down in the State of Kentucky, who had had a decision rendered against him which he did not like, repudiated the decision and showed his contempt for the court by shooting to death one of the judges. The principle upon which he acted was precisely that upon which the democratic party here acts in denouncing everywhere the Supreme Court when its decisions are not in accordance with their opinions or wishes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has demanded a division of the question upon the pending amendment. The Clerk will read the first clause upon which the vote will first be taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

For special deputy marshals of election, the sum of $7,600.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I move to amend by striking out "$600." I desire to call the attention of this House and of the country to the change and the unaccountable change of front presented by the republican party upon the question now under consideration. All during the extra session of this Congress there was but one key-note to their cry. They charged upon the democratic party that we were opposed to free and fair elections. All during this Congress up to to-day we have heard that cry made and reiterated by almost every speaker upon that side of the House. According to republican ideas the democracy were opposed to free and fair elections and the republican party were its champions; and to secure free and fair elections they wanted the deputy marshals and supervisors at the polls.

Now what do we behold? We upon this side of the House are saying to the republican party that we want nothing but free elections; that we are willing, since the Supreme Court has decided the election laws to be constitutional, that you shall have deputy marshals at the polls, and we ask only that they shall be non-partisan.

We have not objected to law. It is a mistake to suppose that this side of the House has objected so much to the constitutionality of the law as to the partisan execution of it. We have now a proposition before this body under which you can have all the deputy marshals you want; we do not limit you to three. We have said, "Take them, but give to each political party a fair representation of them. Strip them of their partisan character and we are ready to vote for them."

What are the excuses we now hear presented by the republican side of the House for refusing to vote for this measure? Do we hear now from that side of the House any more that they want free and fair elections? Not a bit of it. But we are told that they are opposed to this proposition, some because it is a compromise and they are opposed to all compromise, and others tell us that they are opposed to it because we ask that they shall be appointed by the judges and not by the marshals of the United States. Now, gentlemen may think they can deceive the country; but I tell them that the sham is too thin, it is too plain, and the country will see which side of the House really wants fair and free elections.

We on this side of the House are charged with resisting the decisions of the Supreme Court. I deny that we do or wish to do it; we as good citizens accept the decisions of the Supreme Court, and we now propose to stand upon them and frame the laws we pass in accordance with those decisions.

Let me say one word in reference to what dropped from my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.] He is mistaken if he thinks it is necessary to appeal to the Representatives of the South and ask them to stand by this proposition which guarantees to us free and fair elections. Give us but a chance to have non-partisan marshals and supervisors at the polls and when you come to the test you will find the members from the South almost to a man voting for that measure.

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Chairman, if the proposition were legitimately before the House so to amend the election laws that the special deputy marshals should be selected from the different political parties it would have my approval and vote, but the proposition is not properly here. The bill under consideration has been well termed the "immediate deficiency bill." Immediate, because it is demanded to meet pressing wants of the Government; that the Government Printing Office may again be set in full operation; that tens of thousands of claims pending in the Pension Office may be examined and adjudicated; that other deficiencies in the various Departments enumerated in the bill may be supplied. Now the plain and imperative duty of Congress is to pass a bill untrammelled with riders, making appropriations for these immediate and urgent wants of the Government. Instead of so doing the democratic party, which has a majority in both Houses of Congress, brings in this bill with a rider upon it proposing to make radical changes in the election laws, and in substance declaring that the bill shall not pass unless these changes are made. There can be no question about the purpose of the bill and amendments.

By the omission in this deficiency bill of any provision for the payment of special deputy marshals who have served at elections during the last fiscal year we are, of course, to understand that it is the determination of the majority in this House never to pay those officers of the Government. Were there an intention ever to pay them, naturally, provision to that effect would be made in this bill. But the remarks of the gentleman who reported the bill [Mr. MCMAHON] relieve us of all doubt upon this subject, that the democratic party never would appropriate money for this purpose.

Now I only wish to say that by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Maryland case it is declared that the authority of the National Government in elections of Representatives and presidential electors is paramount to that of the States, and that Congress has full power and authority given it by the Constitution to vest in the circuit courts the appointment of supervisors of elections, and that marshals have equal authority to appoint special deputies to assist them in preventing frauds at such elections. This decision only establishes what seemed plain before, and I trust it will remain as the law of this Government as long as the Republic endures.

But, Mr. Chairman, these election laws are not only constitutional, but they are eminently wise and just, for they are designed to prevent frauds at Federal elections, which are the very fountains of our national life. If evils have sometimes crept in under them, as has doubtless been the case, they have shut out evils an hundred-fold greater and maintained the purity of the ballot-box, when without them elections would have been such only in name. It is of small importance to the people of my State whether these laws exist or not except as they relate to the welfare of the whole country, but in districts that cover great cities they are of the highest importance, and therefore deserve the support of all parties and all men. I speak in no spirit of partisanship. These considerations are above all parties, or rather, they are considerations that should govern all parties that desire the maintenance and perpetuity of our republican government and institutions.

Then what justification or excuse is there for withholding from the deputy marshals payment of the fees already earned by them during the past year, and what excuse is there for declaring that they shall not in the future be paid? There is, there can be no justification and no excuse that will be accepted by the American people. And I say to the party in power in this House that as you withhold payment from these officials, so the people in the coming election may withhold power from you. They are lawful officers of the Government, appointed for wise purposes, bound to perform their duties under penalty of fine and imprisonment, and Congress has no more right to refuse to pay them the money they have earned and which is their due than it would have to refuse payment of the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court because that court had rendered a decision to which the majority in this House was opposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RICHARDSON.]

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I withdraw it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a single word in reply to what has been said by the gentleman on the other side. I would like to ask that gentleman how long he has been in the calm mind that makes him and his party willing to obey the Supreme Court. What began this discussion only four days ago? It was the declaration that whatever the Supreme Court might say, the House of Representatives had the right to judge whether the law was constitutional or not. Doubt was expressed whether the democratic party ever would pay these deputies the fees already earned. And now the gentleman rises as though meekly, quietly, trustingly, they had been in favor of carrying out the law since the Supreme Court announced it constitutional. I am glad they are ready to do that to-day. If I had understood that to be the situation several days ago I should have had no need to make my strictures about the purpose to disobey the law after it has been declared a part of the "supreme law of the land" by the highest judicial tribunal.

I do not wish to delay the vote on this question; I am as anxious as anybody to get at the vote. I hope we shall vote for the pending proposition, though we abate no jot or tittle of our opinions on the question of riders.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) This matter is all in a nutshell. We find upon the statute-book a law which in its administration does the greatest injury and wrong to a large body of the American people. We want to ameliorate that statute. We want to have justice done to that party to which I claim to belong. Therefore we occupy the position that while we are not able to wipe out all the offensive and injurious features in this legislation, we will remove as many of them as we can at one time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I simply wanted to correct the history of the matter. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot take the vote while gentlemen are calling out in this way.

Mr. PAGE. I move, pro forma, to amend the amendment by striking out $7,600 and inserting $8,000. I do this for the purpose of replying briefly to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RICHARDSON.] The gentleman says that in the South they have always been in favor of a "free and fair election." Now, in looking over the Congressional Directory I find that in one of the districts of Mississippi there were something over four thousand votes polled for the sitting member against twenty-one "scattering votes." Does the gentleman call that a "free election?" I find that in two districts in the State of Georgia there were less than four thousand votes polled against about twenty "scattering votes." That is the "fair and free election" that the gentleman from South Carolina talks about.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, rose.

Mr. PAGE. I cannot be interrupted.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. As the gentleman has referred to my State, he ought to allow me a remark.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California declines to be interrupted.

Mr. PAGE. What is the reason there was no republican running against the gentleman in the State of Mississippi? Because there is no "fair and free election" in that State; and the gentleman knows it. Mr. Chairman, in the fourth district of Mississippi, represented by the gentleman, [Mr. SINGLETON,] 4,650 votes were cast for him, against 21 "scattering votes," though at a former election 15,000 republican votes were polled! In the district represented by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that gentleman received between three and four thousand votes against 160 scattering votes. These are the "free and fair elections" which the gentleman from South Carolina says that side of the House has always been in favor of! "Free and fair elections!" [Laughter.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I want to answer the remark of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] touching my district.

A MEMBER. It is not needed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. In 1876 the republicans in my district put up as a candidate their strongest man; and after a full canvass had been made, finding that he could not beat me, he withdrew. Then they put up another gentleman; and I beat him 10,000 votes. At the next election, the republicans in my district were so well satisfied they could bring forward no man to beat me that I had no opposition at all. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PAGE. Does such a thing occur in the North? It never does. In the North republican candidates are run in every district.

Mr. RICHMOND. Because they have strength up there.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. COOK. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw that motion until I can be heard for a few moments in reply to the speech of the gentlemen from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois withholds his motion for the present.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that the republican party in the State of Georgia held a convention in the city of Atlanta and resolved to put up no candidates themselves but to support whatever independent candidate should come out against the democratic party. They acted on that policy.

Mr. HOUK. Because a republican candidate could not be protected. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. COOK. Nothing of the sort. I ran against a gentleman who lives in the city of Washington, who has lived here for ten years, who was then and is to-day a clerk in the Post-Office Department. [Laughter on the democratic side of the House.] He canvassed my district, went into every county in it—

A MEMBER. And lives here?

Mr. COOK. Yes, sir; he lives here and is a clerk in the Post-Office Department. [Laughter.] He spoke in my town in the presence of two thousand colored people, and was as uninterrupted in his speech as I am here to-day. I beat him 6,400 votes. He was in the county on the day of the election. He is a worthy, clever, gentleman. He is now a Federal office-holder. He was a captain in the United States Army. He remained in my State until 1868 and then came to Washington and was employed in the Post-Office Department. He was furloughed here for two months [laughter] and went into my district, spoke in my town, and canvassed the entire district from county to county.

Mr. CONGER. And came back alive. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. COOK. He came back badly beaten to resume his clerkship in the Post-Office Department. [Laughter on the democratic side.] He was beaten 6,400 votes at that election although he was supported by the republican party with funds. He said my district had never been canvassed and if the republicans would only give him money he would go down there and canvass it. The republicans did give him the money and he did go down there and canvass the district, going into every county, but as I have already said I beat him 6,400 votes. At the last election the republican executive committee came to the conclusion there was no use of running any candidates; and that is the reason why my colleagues, Mr. STEPHENS and Mr. BLOUNT, as well as myself, had no opposition.

Mr. HOUK. Will the gentleman explain why it was that districts in Georgia where in former elections 20,000 and 30,000 votes had been polled, in 1878 the vote fell down to 2,000 and 3,000? Why was that?

Mr. COOK. Republicans gave up the contest, as they said from experience there was no use of running any candidates against us as they were largely defeated when they did their best.

Mr. HOUK. Why was this if not because of violence—

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen must preserve order. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. HOUK. I was only following the example of bulldozing on the other side.

Mr. STEVENSON. I now move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing this debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted, and the pending question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CONGER. I demand a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. A division of the question being demanded, under the rules, the vote will first be taken on that part of the amendment which proposes to appropriate $7,600 to pay the marshals.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. I object. We all know what it is.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the second part of the amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections for performing any duties in reference to any election shall receive the sum of $5 per day in full for their compensation; and that the appointments of such special deputy marshals shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties, or by the district judge in the absence of the circuit judge. Said special deputies shall be appointed in equal numbers from the different political parties; and the persons so appointed shall be persons of good moral character and shall be well-known residents of the voting precinct in which their duties are to be performed.

Mr. SAMFORD. Is it too late to give notice I shall call the yeas and nays in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Notice given here would have no effect whatever in the House.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 5.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers and appoint Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. CONGER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 121, noes 29.

So the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announcing the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 4244) for the establishment of titles in Hot Springs, and for other purposes, with amendments in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the Senate communicated to the House a letter of the Secretary of War to the Chief of Engineers, in reference to the examinations of the Noxubee River, Mississippi, and Choctaw-hatchee River, Alabama; and also a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in connection with the report of Captain A. N. Damrell, Corps of Engineers, a communication of the Chief of Engineers covering the question of the report, with accompanying map, from the board of engineers for river and harbor improvement, to which the report of Captain Damrell was referred for consideration.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as amended:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMAHON. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the deficiency bill, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments thereto.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment will now be read. Does the gentleman desire a separate vote on each amendment?

Mr. McMAHON. No, take them all in a bunch.

Mr. HAWLEY. No, we desire to have a separate vote on some of them.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire a separate vote on each amendment?

Mr. McMAHON. I suggest that gentlemen designate the amendments on which they desire to have a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad if gentlemen would designate which they desire a vote on.

Mr. CONGER. It is impossible to tell at this time, for in the hurry of the consideration of this bill it would be difficult to designate now what particular amendment we desire to vote upon. Let the amendments be all read, and we will then indicate on which we desire a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause all of the amendments to be read, and will ask gentlemen to indicate on which they desire a separate vote.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union were severally read and agreed to without a division except the following, on which a separate vote was asked:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

For the payment of fees and expenses of United States marshals and the general deputies appointed during the fiscal year ending June 30, A. D., 1880, $600,000.

Mr. McMAHON. That is an amendment offered by the committee and which was amended in the Committee of the Whole, and therefore I suppose that the amendment ought to be incorporated with this as it is all one amendment.

The SPEAKER. The remainder of the amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For special deputy marshals of elections, the sum of $7,600: Provided, That hereafter special deputy marshals of elections for performing any duties in reference to any election shall receive the sum of $5 per day in full for their compensation, and that the appointments of such special deputy marshals shall be made by the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such marshals are to perform their duties or by the district judge in the absence of the circuit judge, such special deputies to be appointed in equal numbers from the different political parties; and the persons so appointed shall be persons of good moral character and shall be well-known residents of the voting precinct in which their duties are to be performed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I demand a division of that question.

Mr. McMAHON. I claim that it cannot be divided under the provisions of the rules.

Mr. CONGER. There are two distinct propositions in that amendment; one appropriates money and the other relates to the performance of duty. I hold that it is subject to division under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is nothing in the rule which warrants such construction on an amendment from Committee of the Whole. It is to be determined by the former parliamentary practice and the decisions of the House in similar cases; which decisions seem to have been uniform.

Mr. CONGER. But there never has been a decision of the Chair that an amendment to be voted on, which is capable of division, shall not be divided on the demand of a member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always understood the contrary in regard to amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. It may be that is another iniquity in these rules which we have not hitherto discovered.

The SPEAKER. The decision is not based on either present or former rule. The words of present and former rule are substantially the same, and the meaning of the words in both exactly the same. The decision has its basis on former parliamentary decisions under present and former Speakers, and appears as the undisturbed practice of the House.

The Clerk will read the paragraph in the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

An amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole as an entire amendment is not divisible. (Journals 1, 28, page 1061; 1, 29, pages 366, 642; 1, 30, page 1059; 2, 30, page 574.)

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole is not divisible.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have the rule of the House read which says a question shall be divided on the demand of any member.

The SPEAKER. What has been read are rulings in regard to an amendment coming into the House from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. It is so with all the amendments.

The SPEAKER. None of them could be, nor was any amendment divided which was reported from the Committee of the Whole to the House in reference to the bill under present consideration.

Mr. CONGER. But this was divided and voted on separately.

The SPEAKER. That was in Committee of the Whole, and the equities of the rule alluded to have been, as it were, satisfied by the action in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. The others were voted on separately.

The SPEAKER. In the Committee of the Whole; but they come into the House as amendments of the committee, and under the practice of the House and the uniform decisions of former Speakers an amendment of the Committee of the Whole is not divisible.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the rule may be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are certain occasions on which the division of a question cannot be demanded; as on the question of the engrossment and third reading of a bill the various propositions contained in the bill cannot then be divided. So on the final passage of the bill. So when an amendment is reported from the Committee of the Whole; the Committee of the Whole recommending that amendment, we must concur with the committee in that recommendation, or non-concur. We cannot take part and reject part of the recommendation of a committee.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Clerk to read clause 6 of Rule XVI of the rules which have just been adopted by this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the demand of any member, before the question is put, a question shall be divided if it include propositions so distinct in substance that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain.

Mr. CONGER. Now, I, as a member of the House, demand that there shall be a division of this proposition, because the question may be divided so that one being taken away, a substantive proposition will remain. Each is a distinct proposition, and I ask for a separate vote upon each.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole must be voted upon in its entirety, and is not divisible.

Mr. CONGER. And I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The question being taken on Mr. SPRINGER's motion to lay the appeal on the table, there were—ayes 110, noes 77.

Mr. CONGER. I consider this ruling upon this point so important that I desire the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the better course.

The question being put on ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 47.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PRICE. May I ask a parliamentary question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear.

Mr. PRICE. Does the Speaker decide that a measure containing two separate propositions— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. PRICE. I think I might be allowed half a minute to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen.

Mr. PRICE. Does the Speaker decide that a question containing two distinct propositions is not divisible on the demand of a member?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides, and he has the practice of the House as his authority for doing so, that an amendment coming from the Committee of the Whole is not divisible; that is, an amendment coming from the Committee of the Whole must be voted upon in its entirety.

Mr. PRICE. Does it make any difference whether it comes from a Committee of the Whole or from any other source?

The SPEAKER. It does. The decision of the Chair is that an amendment coming from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as this does must be voted on in its entirety. The Chair cannot recall to his memory any decision different from the one he now makes.

Mr. PRICE. Will the Chair allow me one moment further? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The Chair is quite willing to hear, although he is clear in his judgment upon this point.

Mr. PRICE. The question is one of very considerable importance and I think I might be listened to for a moment. I wish to say there is no manual of parliamentary law from Mansfield down to this day that does not distinctly set forth this principle, that any measure containing two distinct propositions shall be divided upon the demand of a member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes as his authority the uniform practice of the House that an amendment coming from the Committee of the Whole is not divisible. He ruled accordingly. From his ruling the gentleman from Michigan appealed and that appeal the gentleman from Illinois has moved to lay on the table. Upon the motion to lay the appeal on the table, which is not debatable, the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BURROWS. Simply a word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to read from Wilson's Digest of Parliamentary Law, page 12, section 77, as follows:

An amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole as an entire amendment is not divisible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has caused to be read a decision by the House which he made the groundwork of his own ruling.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that the Chair has shifted from my position— [Cries of "Regular order!"] Gentlemen may wait; I will stand here till to-morrow morning, if the Chair will hear me.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to state that I made one point of order which the Chair has not ruled upon, but has ruled upon another.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that an amendment coming from the Committee of the Whole is not divisible, the point in dispute; and there have been repeated decisions by the House to that effect.

Mr. CONGER. I made a point of order on paragraph 6 of Rule XVI.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Is it in order to discuss a point of order after the Chair has decided it?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except upon appeal; and the motion having been made to lay the appeal upon the table, it is not debatable.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair. But the Chair always desires to hear—

Mr. CONGER. It is due to myself that I should state that I asked the ruling of the Chair on paragraph 6 of Rule XVI, which ruling the Chair has not given at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman himself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hiscock] called for a division of the question on the amendment as reported from the Committee of the Whole, and the Chair ruled that the amendment was not divisible. From that decision the gentleman appealed, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moved to lay the appeal on the table, upon which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. Has not the Chair already decided this question by allowing a part of the amendment to be read, and then announcing that unless there was objection it would be considered as adopted?

The SPEAKER. They were separate amendments. The gentleman is not well informed on the point.

Mr. THOMAS. Then for the purpose of being better informed, I desire to further inquire—

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not intend any reflection upon the gentleman by the remark he made.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well; that is all right. I want to be informed, and hence I make the inquiry. If this is composed of two separate and substantive propositions, I want to know by what right and under what rule the Speaker holds there cannot be a separate vote upon each proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House is not divisible, and the Chair calls attention to the following from the Journal of the House of the first session Twenty-ninth Congress, pages 365 and 366:

On motion of Mr. Bowlin, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Speaker resumed the chair, and Mr. Tibbatts reported that the committee having, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, particularly the said joint resolution No. 5, had directed him to report the same to the House with an amendment.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the said resolution, the question being on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The previous question was moved by Mr. Price, and seconded; and the main question was ordered and stated, namely, Will the House agree to the said amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union? When

A division of the question was demanded by Mr. Thurman, so as to take the question on each branch of the resolution separately.

The Speaker stated that in conformity with the usual practice of the House the amendment was divisible, and was about proceeding to put the question on striking out the original resolution and inserting the first branch of the amendment, when

Mr. Boyd raised the question of order, that, as the said amendment was reported from the Committee of the Whole House as an entire and distinct proposition, it could not be divided.

The Speaker decided against the point of order raised by Mr. Boyd.

From this decision Mr. Boyd appealed.

And the question being put, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

It was decided in the negative.

So the decision of the Chair was reversed.

And the question was accordingly put, Will the House agree to the amendment as reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

And decided in the affirmative—yeas 172, nays 46.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the members present, &c.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand that there has been no change in the rule since that decision was made?

The SPEAKER. Substantially none that the Chair is advised of. The language of the old and the new rules is substantially the same and the meaning exactly the same.

The question was upon the motion to lay on the table the appeal by Mr. CONGER from the decision of the Chair; and being taken, there were—yeas 167, nays 49, not voting 76; as follows:

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, with Mr. CHITTENDEN.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. MILLER.

Mr. EWING with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. WISE with Mr. HALL.

Mr. BRAGG with Mr. LORING.

Mr. CLYMER with Mr. HUBBELL.

Mr. SPARKS with Mr. WHITE.

Mr. CHALMERS with Mr. VAN VOORHIS.

Mr. HARMER with Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois.

Mr. O'BRIEN with Mr. CHITTENDEN.

Mr. JORGENSEN with Mr. BEALE.

Mr. BOYD with Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. ELAM with Mr. DICK.

Mr. WARD with Mr. AIKEN.

Mr. FELTON with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, with Mr. OVERTON.

Mr. RICHMOND with Mr. PRESCOTT.

Mr. URNER with Mr. McLANE.

Mr. CRAPO with Mr. ROSS.

Mr. CROWLEY with Mr. MONEY.

During the announcement of the foregoing pairs, when the pair of Mr. KEIFER with Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, was announced,

Mr. OVERTON said: Mr. Speaker, I supposed I was paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CLARK.] I desire to vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman, under a misunderstanding, declined to vote, his vote ought to be received.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OVERTON] immediately after the announcement of pairs is concluded. These pairs as read had better be carefully watched, because several gentlemen appear to be paired with more than one gentleman, and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CLARK] appears to be paired with three gentlemen.

The announcement of pairs was resumed and concluded.

Mr. MCMAHON. I desire to state, in justice to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CLARK,] that he told me last evening, when starting for home, that he was paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. OVERTON.]

Mr. OVERTON. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CLARK] met me last evening, and requested me to pair with him for to-day until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] should leave. In refraining from voting upon this roll-call, I did not know that the gentleman from Ohio had left. The pair between him and the gentleman from New Jersey now operates.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OVERTON] is entitled to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania under the circumstances. In the opinion of the Chair he ought to be allowed to vote.

Mr. OVERTON's name was called; and he voted "no."

Mr. CALKINS. I have been paired with the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. SAWYER.] Forgetting that the pair had run out, I did not vote. I see the gentleman in his seat.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Missouri voted?

Mr. CALKINS. He has.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] should be allowed to vote. [Cries of "All right."]

The name of Mr. CALKINS was called, and he voted "ay."

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest that the list of pairs, as read, had better be revised, so it may not appear that some gentlemen are paired two or three times.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the pairs will be recorded as they have been read. I insist that they shall be entered in the Journal in that way.

The SPEAKER. A member cannot be paired with more than one member.

Mr. CONGER. That is not the fault of the record.

Mr. SPRINGER. These discrepancies are evidently the result of mistake.

Mr. CONGER. I think it would be well—

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is well that gentlemen should appear as being paired two or three times.

Mr. SPRINGER. There has been no intention, of course, on the part of any gentlemen to put on the record a pair that was not authorized. I hope the necessary corrections will be made.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The question recurred on the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HISCOCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROWNE moved the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, noes 107, not voting 70; as follows:

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MCMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that motion, I move the House do now adjourn, and on that motion I demand a division.

Mr. McMAHON. If we do not pass this bill to-night we cannot do so until next week, as to-morrow has been set apart for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

The House divided; and there were ayes 34, noes not counted.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. McMAHON demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMP. Under subdivision 6 of Rule XXI, must not the yeas and nays be taken on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 104, not voting 77; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. DWIGHT.

Mr. CARLISLE with Mr. BROWNE.

Mr. LOUNSBURY with Mr. BAILEY.

The vote was then announced as above recorded. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY PRINTING BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce at this time, from the Committee on Appropriations, a bill for the purpose of appropriating $100,000 to carry on the printing for the different Departments of the Government. The bill which has just been passed, providing among others for a deficiency in the printing, will take some time to pass the Senate; and the $50,000 appropriated in the star-service bill may not pass the House for some days yet. Therefore I ask that the present bill be considered. The Public Printer informs me that he will have no money on hand after Monday next to do the public printing. I therefore ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. PAGE. I will object.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I will withdraw the bill, as the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] objects.

Mr. PAGE. Very well; you have an appropriation of $50,000 in the star-service bill; why do you not bring that in?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not hear what the gentleman says.

Mr. BURROWS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

PUBLICATION OF CONGRESSIONAL DEBATES.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 2657) to prohibit the reporting and publication of the debates and proceedings of Congress at public expense, reported adversely this morning from the Committee on Printing, be recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BURROWS. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

DEFICIENCY PRINTING BILL.

Mr. PAGE. At the request of friends on this side of the House I will withdraw my objection to the present consideration of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BURROWS. Then I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5258) appropriating money for the public printing; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5258) appropriating money providing for the public printing.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Cannot we pass that bill by unanimous consent?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It is now in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and it will take but a few moments to pass it in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering a deficiency appropriation bill. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 5258) to appropriate money providing for the public printing. Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $100,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to continue the public printing: Provided, That the entire sum appropriated to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing and binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing of debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for the Departments, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving for the present fiscal year, shall not exceed the sum of $400,000.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SAMFORD. Is this in addition to the $400,000 already appropriated for this purpose?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; it will be taken out of that.

Mr. SAMFORD. I know that is the object of the bill, but if we pass this bill as an independent proposition, I do not see how it will qualify the other.

Mr. ATKINS. It does qualify the other, because it provides that the total amount expended shall not exceed $400,000.

I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House. The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5258) appropriating money for the public printing, had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to know whether it would be in order to move to suspend the rules as to the calling of the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the sixth clause of the twenty-first rule to be read. The Chair a few moments ago, when the yeas and nays were demanded by members under the clause of the rule just read, recognized the right of calling the yeas and nays because a sufficient number of members were on the floor asking the yeas and nays without regard to the rule stated.

The Clerk will now read the sixth clause of Rule XXI.

The Clerk read as follows:

6. Upon all general appropriation and revenue bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the yeas and nays shall be taken on the passage of such bills in the House and entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this hardly comes within the scope of a general appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. That would rule out appropriation bills or tariff bills.

The SPEAKER. The question did not arise on the deficiency bill to-day, because there was a sufficient number of members on the floor to call the yeas and nays, more than one-fifth of the number who voted on the preceding vote.

Mr. CONGER. This appropriates $10,000?

The SPEAKER. That is not the rule.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest that by unanimous consent we waive that point—

The SPEAKER. It can be waived by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAWLEY. And not raise it in this case.

Mr. SPRINGER. It only waives the question.

Mr. CONGER. But the rule provides that the yeas and nays must be called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is mistaken as to his suggestion. There is nothing in the rule about $10,000. That was voted down in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the bill will be passed by unanimous consent without the yeas and nays, so that the Chair may not at present make a decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not made a decision. On the passage of the deficiency bill the Chair did not rule on that point, because there were more than one-fifth of the members up, and that number had the right to demand the yeas and nays. This question, however, was raised then; but the yeas and nays being ordered under another rule it was not necessary to decide they should be called under this rule.

Mr. CONGER. If it should be decided bills of this class are not general appropriation bills, coming under Rule XXI, then this bill might have all kinds of riders attached to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the bill be passed by unanimous consent without the yeas and nays being called. I hope there will be no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer that the House should put a construction upon that rule. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that by unanimous consent the yeas and nays have not been called on this bill, and the Chair reserves any decision in regard to the construction to be put on the sixth clause of Rule XXI.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to inquire of the Chair what to-morrow's session is for?

The SPEAKER. For debate only in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the funding bill.

Mr. PAGE. No business to be transacted?

The SPEAKER. No business to be transacted and no votes to be taken.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KEIFER, until the 26th instant, on account of important business;

To Mr. MILES, for ten days; and

To Mr. MORTON, for one week, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Harriet Jones, there being no adverse report thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the attention of the House for five minutes. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. COX. The Chair promised to recognize me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman; but the regular order being demanded, the Chair has no volition. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

By Mr. ANDERSON: The petition of L. R. Yates, of Hiawatha, Kansas, for the removal of the stamp-tax on perfumery, cosmetics, and proprietary medicines—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BAKER: The petition of Benjamin L. Davenport and 64 others, citizens of Elkhart, Indiana, against the repeal or modification of the present duty on paper—to the same committee.

By Mr. BERRY: The petition of John T. Campbell and others, of California, soldiers of the United States Army, engaged in the late war, for the early passage of a law providing for the payment of the difference between the value of greenbacks, in which they were paid for their services, and the value of gold at the time of payment—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BOUCK: The petitions of citizens of Wisconsin for the establishment of post-routes from Bear Creek to Union Bridge, and from De Pere to Rosecrans, Wisconsin—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BRENTS: Two petitions of publishers of Oregon and Washington Territory, that materials used in making paper be placed on the free list, and for a reduction of the duty on printing-paper—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BUCKNER: A bill to survey the Missouri River between the mouth of Taque and Charette Creeks, in Warren County, Missouri—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BUTTERWORTH: The petition of Charles Wells and 100 others, type-founders, publishers, and printers, against the removal of the duty on type—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GEORGE Q. CANNON: The petition of Marder, Luse & Co., type-founders of Chicago and San Francisco, of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. CARPENTER: The petitions of William W. Barnes and others; of J. C. Hillyer and 12 others, and of J. L. Ruick and 24 others, ex-soldiers of O'Brien County, Iowa, against the passage of Senate bill No. 496—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ALVAH A. CLARK: Papers relating to the claim of Nathaniel G. Smith, to be relieved from accounting for certain funds of the Government of which he was robbed while a postmaster—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. COVERT: The petition of Thomas H. Todd, of Long Island City, New York, for the abolition of the tariff on printing-type—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. COX: The petition of Andrew Lantz, of New York City, to be reimbursed expenditures made in recruiting and organizing the Fifty-eighth New York Volunteers—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DEERING: The petition of P. V. M. Pool, druggist, of Carpenter, Iowa, for the removal of the stamp-tax on perfumery, cosmetics, and proprietary medicines—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DUNELL: The petition of R. French and 40 others, citizens of Minnesota, for the passage of the Weaver bill—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ERRETT: The petition of soldiers of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, against the passage of the bill providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of soldiers of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, for the equalization of bounties—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FORT: The petition of H. W. Yates and others, citizens of Illinois, that Congress enact such laws as will alleviate the oppressions imposed upon the people by the transportation monopolies that now control the interstate commerce of the country—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Hiram Farmer and others, of Illinois, that the patent laws be so amended as to make the manufacturer or vendor of patented articles alone responsible for infringement—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. GARFIELD: Memorial of the Ordnance Company, Norman Wiard, superintendent, proposing an already tested, cheap, and ready solution of the ordnance problem; showing how to save the Government $54,258,000 in the cost of armament of fortifications; proposing to furnish guns of greater efficiency as well as of required power such as have heretofore been deemed impossible of attainment; proposing an easy and cheap way to secure sixteen hundred powerful guns at a cost of $1,000,000 within six months, &c.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GEDDES: The petitions of E. A. Parrish, R. C. Adrian, and 250 others, citizens (late soldiers) of Tuscarawas County, and of Charles Johnston and others, citizens (late soldiers) of Coschocton County, Ohio, against the passage of the sixty-district bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GILLETTE: The petitions of L. P. Sherman and 85 others, of J. H. Hatch and 81 others, and J. G. Rounds and 90 others, citizens and business men of Des Moines, Iowa, for the passage of a bankrupt law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HERBERT: The petition of James A. Scott, publisher of the Advance, Montgomery, Alabama, for the abolition of the duty on type—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HILL: The petitions of W. Wrede and 100 others, of F. Duck and 100 others, of John Mason and others, of J. W. Berry and 100 others, citizens of Defiance and Williams Counties, and of Casper Kahl and 100 others, citizens of the sixth district of Ohio, soldiers of the United States Army, engaged in the late war, for the early passage of a law providing for the payment of the difference between the value of the greenbacks, in which they were paid for their services, and the value of gold at the time of payment—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JOSEPH J. MARTIN: The petition of the publisher of the Falcon, Elizabeth City, North Carolina, that materials used in making paper be placed on the free list, and for the reduction of the duty on printing-paper—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MCKENZIE: The petitions of J. M. Nicholls and Charles W. Fischer, for the removal of the stamp-tax on perfumery, cosmetics, and proprietary medicines—to the same committee.

By Mr. MCKINLEY: The petitions of A. M. McGregor, of the publishers of the Ohio Volks Zeitung, of the Shreve Journal, of T. E. Peckinpugh, of W. S. Potts, and of R. E. Watson, of Ohio, for the abolition of the duty on type—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of A. McGregor, that materials used in making paper be placed on the free list, and for a reduction of the duty on printing-paper—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of citizens of Stark County, Ohio, that Congress enact such laws as will alleviate the oppressions imposed upon the people by the transportation monopolies that now control the interstate commerce of the country—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of citizens of Stark County, Ohio, that the patent laws be so amended as to make the manufacturer or vendor of patented articles alone responsible for infringement—to the Committee on Patents.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 20, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair.) The Clerk will read a letter received from Mr. Speaker RANDALL.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1880.

SIR: I expect to be absent from the House of Representatives during tomorrow's (Saturday's) session, and in consequence herewith name and appoint you, under power given me by the rules of the House, to act as Speaker in my stead for that day.

Your obedient servant,

Hon. J. C. S. BLACKBURN,

Member of House of Representatives.

SAM. J. RANDALL.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Journal will not be read this morning, the session of to-day having been assigned for debate only on the refunding bill. The Journal will be read on Monday next.

REFUNDING BILL.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. COVERT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FELTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. FELTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to make some corrections of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the remarks I made in Committee of the Whole on this bill when it was formerly under consideration.

On page 19 of the RECORD of March 5, line 25, first column, what is printed $5,000,000, should be $500,000.

On line 27, what should read $250,000, is printed $2,500,000.

On line 29, what should read $3,500,000, is printed $30,000,000.

On line 37, what is printed $10,000,000, should read $1,000,000.

I desire that these corrections should be made. I further state that on page 9 of the pamphlet edition of the speech the same errors in the original issue of that edition were made, which I desire also to be considered as corrected.

[The speech to which these corrections refer is printed on page 1313.]

Mr. FELTON. At the proper time I shall introduce a substitute for the pending bill. I send it to the Clerk that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required to redeem any bonds of the United States which may become redeemable during the years 1880 and 1881, to the amount of the gold and silver coin now in the Treasury which may be in excess of 25 per cent. of the outstanding United States notes, using said excess of gold and silver coin for the redemption of said bonds.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby required, six months after the above-mentioned amount of bonds is redeemed, and semi-annually thereafter, to redeem said remaining bonds to the amount of the gold and silver coin which may be in the Treasury at the time in excess of 25 per cent. of the outstanding United States notes.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby required to purchase silver bullion to the amount of $4,000,000 per month with lawful money of the United States: Provided, Said bullion can be purchased at par with said lawful money; and the Secretary of the Treasury is required to have the bullion so purchased coined into standard dollars as now provided by law.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby forbidden and prohibited from issuing hereafter any interest-bearing bond for the purpose of funding or refunding the national debt or any part thereof.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Chairman, one of the most important questions which will engage the attention of this Congress will be the refunding of the public debt, or at least so much of it as has not already been provided for. When the refunding acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, were passed by Congress the national debt was so enormous, and the financial condition of the country was so uncertain as to well-nigh close the mouths of those who are opposed to all refunding systems and processes. Under these acts bonds for refunding purposes were authorized to the amount of $1,500,000,000. Of this amount there have been issued $1,395,345,950, leaving available for future refunding operations $104,654,050.

We must confess that the refunding process up to this time has resulted in an annual saving to the Government in the interest charge of $19,900,846. But the interest at this time on this refunded debt of $1,395,345,950, even at the reduced rates of interest, amounts to $61,738,838 per annum, and this immense annual drain upon the labor of the country has been by the act of refunding settled irrevocably for many years upon the tax-payers.

Now we are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that ways and means must be provided to meet maturing bonds in 1880 and 1881, amounting to $782,071,700, as follows:

December 31, 1880, six percents	$18,415,000
June 30, 1881, six percents	254,392,550
May 1, 1881, five percents	508,440,350
July 1, 1881, six percents	823,000

The Secretary of the Treasury recommends "that authority be given at the present session of Congress to issue, sell, and dispose of at not less than par in coin 4 per cent. bonds of the description set forth in the act of July 14, 1870, and refunding certificates of the description set forth in the act of February 26, 1879, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions to the extent necessary to redeem the bonds thus falling due as above described."

In opposing the suggestion and recommendation of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, permit me to say the whole country recognizes the validity and binding force of this national debt. There is no disposition among the wealth-producing classes to repudiate directly or indirectly our national obligations. No patriot will entertain for one moment a proposition which, if consummated, would disturb the moral and business relations of this country for unnumbered generations. For the Government to prove recreant to its pledges and act in bad faith toward its creditors would tend more to unsettle and destroy all legal and moral obligations among the people—those obligations which bind men to men, and which bind the citizen to the government—than war with all its desolating and demoralizing influences could accomplish. Civilized society is based upon confidence in our fellow-men, and the government which repudiates its debts must expect its example to influence its entire mass of citizenship—undermining the very pillars upon which society is resting and entailing upon posterity a stain never to be erased. It is wonderful how bad faith on the part of a government in all ages of our civilization has affected the subjects and citizens of that government. There are innumerable instances in European history where governments have annihilated a portion of their public indebtedness, and not one which did not act most injuriously upon the great body of the people.

Representative government is the exponent of the people represented. Congress is or should be simply the mouth-piece of the people, and only out of the fullness of the great national heart should it speak. The mere suggestion that repudiation is possible in this country would demonstrate a state of public morals that would be alarming to the American patriot.

We are morally as well as legally obliged to pay the bonded debt of this country. The credit of the United States must be preserved at all hazards, because with nations, as with individuals, "a good name is more to be desired than riches," and we cannot sacrifice reputation and honor by sacrificing those who have trusted the Government.

We must meet these maturing bonds, and I think love of country and a due regard for the interest of the people require that we make arrangements to cancel them at the time their payment comes within the option of the Government or as soon thereafter as the surplus revenues of the country will permit.

This debt is now within our reach; it is payable, and I am opposed to placing it beyond our control for the next twenty years and postponing its final settlement for the next forty or fifty years. I am unchangeably opposed to making this debt a perpetual burden upon the tax-payers of this country, entailing upon this and coming generations obligations which can and should be discharged now.

There is no disguising the fact that this entire funding system, or rather this proposition to refund the public debt, looks to the perpetuity of that debt. There is a class of moneyed men in this country who long have manipulated the counsels of the nation, whose pecuniary gains and profits are to be subserved by the perpetuity of this immense funded debt. They have persuaded themselves that their individual interest, which is totally disconnected with the labor of the country, is the collective interest of our struggling, sweating, producing multitudes found in our factories, mines, workshops, and especially found on our farms throughout our widely extended country. These men, whose entire annual incomes are derived from interest on dead capital, capital which disappeared in our war expenditures, and which interest is now simply a drain upon labor, are attempting to perpetuate this drain by blinding the producing classes to the evils of a great national debt.

In perpetuating this debt they perpetuate the money power or the power of accumulated capital which now controls the politics, the prices of commodities, the wages of labor, the relative strength of sections, and every movement and enterprise which advances or retards the growth and prosperity of the United States. This money power for the last few years has exerted an incalculable influence in this country. It has entered our political conventions, our legislative halls, dictated platforms for parties, disposed of our public securities, regulated the volume and character of our currency, and held a graduated scale of values over the productions and property of forty millions of American citizens. It is wrong to continue such a power in this country, to strengthen and confirm class rule where we should labor to equalize and elevate all classes. It is wrong to encourage and continue this great fount of evil until everything in this country is tinged with the aristocratic spirit—until all is privilege, proscription, monopoly, association, and corporation.

Debt is an unmeasured evil. To the individual it is an incubus, destroying all the springs of human happiness, all generous effort, making life's pathway hopeless, and exposing to temptations which drown men's souls in perdition.

National debt is equally or more destructive in its tendencies and pernicious in its effects—possibly with this difference, a national debt is a "society which is in debt to a part of itself," and the general result is, that a part of this society is impoverished to enrich the creditor part.

The interest on this national debt of ours is a continual drain upon the labor of the country, sapping the profits of our industries and blocking the educational and commercial enterprises of our people.

Since 1870 we have refunded to an amount which, at the reduced rates of interest, amounts to an annual drain for years of some $60,000,000, and when the entire interest-bearing debt shall have been refunded in 4 per cent. bonds, we will have an annual interest charge of about $72,000,000, and this reduced rate of interest will in forty years amount to $2,880,000,000, and in fifty years, the time advocated by some members of Congress for these bonds to run, the interest will amount to $3,500,000,000.

This immense sum of money is to come from the labor of this country, and that only to discharge the interest on a principal nearly two-thirds as large, which must also be finally canceled by the hard earnings of labor.

Now add this annual drain for interest to the estimated expenditures exclusive of the sinking fund and you have an annual expenditure of $223,000,000, which amount multiplied by forty, the number of years contemplated by this refunding scheme, and you have the sum of $8,920,000,000, and if multiplied by fifty, the time suggested by some, even at the rate of 3½ per cent. you have the incalculable sum of from ten to eleven billions of dollars to be extracted from the labor of this country within the time specified.

If there should be no war, no increased extravagance, no multiplied sinecures, no augmented appropriations, this is the amount which must be raised by taxation within the next fifty years and at the above-mentioned rate of interest—all this exclusive of the principal of the national debt.

We are told that the country will increase in wealth, and these figures should not alarm us. Macaulay, in defending the national debt and funding system of England, says of its opponents:

They made no allowance for the effect produced by the incessant progress of every experimental science and by the incessant efforts of every man to get on in life. They saw that the debt grew, and they forgot that other things grew as well as the debt. They greatly overrated the burden; they greatly underrated the strength by which the burden was to be borne.

Would it not have been well for this distinguished historian and men who sympathize in his views instead of speculating as to the weight and burden a nation can bear with progressing industries, to turn their attention to the possible removal of that weight and burden. Instead of testing the capacity of a country to bear taxation, rather seek to lessen and equalize taxation. The question in view of these startling figures just announced is not whether the United States can grow in wealth with this burden resting upon the shoulders of its laboring population, but rather how much faster would these States develop, what richer rewards would labor enjoy, and how much more equally would wealth be distributed.

What is taxation? The annual income of a government consists of the united produce of its agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. Taxes are a certain proportion of the annual income levied for the public service. In other words, they are a certain proportion of the income of the laborer, the farmer, the merchant, and manufacturer, abstracted for the use of the Government. The portion of income the different classes can appropriate to this purpose without creating national poverty and misery is limited. If taxation be carried beyond this limit, the necessities of life of the laboring classes will be abridged; the profits of trade and agriculture will be so far reduced that capital will diminish or cease to be employed or transferred to countries where it will be more productive. If the amount of money abstracted from our producing classes by taxation could remain in their hands, then the incomes of producers would be increased, the profits of the farmer, merchant, and manufacturer would be augmented, their capital increased, and the means of creating employment extended. Tax-paying is nothing more or less than the industrious giving a portion of their produce for the maintenance of government. In this case of refunding the national debt, it is compelling the industrious to give nearly eighty millions' worth of their produce per annum for the maintenance of the bondholders.

The continuance of the debt at this time means the perpetuity of the debt. It has been boldly avowed by some of the advocates of this scheme that their object is to perpetuate this interest-bearing debt, as it would afford in this country a safe investment for the savings of the people. Where is the nation that ever adopted the funding system which has to any considerable extent ever diminished its public debt; which has not gone on increasing that debt; which has not on trivial occasions borrowed money and encouraged extravagance; which has not found therein an incentive to war and territorial aggrandizement, a stimulant for centralized powers and the curtailment of the liberties of the people?

In England, from the Conquest to the accession of Charles II there was no national debt. They paid their way. In the reign of William III the national debt commenced. England's distinguished statesmen had been attracted to the funding system by the example of Holland. "On the 15th of December, 1692, the House of Commons resolved itself into a committee of ways and means. Somers took the chair. Montague proposed to raise a million by way of loan; the proposition was approved, and it was ordered that a bill should be brought in. The details of the scheme were much discussed and modified; but the principle appears to have been popular with all parties. The moneyed men were glad to have a good opportunity of investing what they had hoarded. The landed men, hard-pressed by the load of taxation, were ready to consent to anything for the sake of present ease. On the 20th of January the bill was read a third time, carried up to the Lords by Somers, and passed by them without any amendment." By this memorable law new duties were imposed on beer and other liquors, and these additional taxes were mortgaged for the payment of the loan.

Thus the funding system or mortgaging of taxes was favorably considered and the debt has gone on increasing in the aggregate until in 1879 the debt of Great Britain and Ireland amounted to £730,000,000 and the debt of the whole empire was about £966,250,000.

The interest on the permanent debt of Great Britain and Ireland has during the present century amounted to more than two thousand millions of pounds. This coupled with the other annual expenditures has pushed taxation to its limits in that kingdom; has and is driving hundreds of thousands of its producing classes as emigrants to other countries; has for all time saddled upon the industries of England a moneyed aristocracy controlling its legislation, owning its real estate, its stocks, and consols.

The hope of paying this debt has long departed from the mind of every English laborer, and every English aristocrat is prepared with a plausible argument to show that a great national debt is a great national blessing.

These facts and inferences apply to all the European governments. Spain, with its national debt of £500,000,000, now bankrupt and prostrated; Austria owing £386,000,000; Italy, £400,000,000; Russia, an interest-bearing debt of £420,000,000. The practice of funding has gradually enfeebled every State which has adopted it, and I would inquire if it is likely that in the United States alone a practice which has brought either weakness or desolation into every other country should prove altogether innocent. Is it probable that the system of borrowing money and refunding for an almost indefinite time, which in all other countries has established a "money power" which has tyrannized over and enslaved the laboring classes, should discriminate in favor of this Federal Government? The continuance of this debt will for forty or fifty years longer divert that amount of capital from the productive industries of the country. We must increase our agricultural and manufactured products. We must multiply our markets. We must provide for an ever-growing population. We must enrich the finest domain that ever blessed a people. Let us not then lock up in non-productive bonds this immense capital.

The continuance of this debt will for forty years longer exempt this vast capital from State and municipal taxation, thus increasing the burdens of labor. To-day your farmer must pay an ad valorem tax to the State government upon his agricultural implements. That humble home where nestles the virtue, the patriotism, the strength, and glory of your Government is taxed, with all its surroundings; but your millionaire, who invests his fortune in your securities and never contributes a dollar to the wealth of the country, lives exempted from the necessity of supporting the State and municipal governments which protect his life and property.

To continue this debt is to continue for forty years longer the miserable revenue systems which now oppress our people. In addition to the tariff upon imported articles of consumption, which is oppressive in many of its details and should be modified, you lay your heavy hand upon our own industries, especially upon our agricultural industries, by taxing whisky and tobacco. To collect these unjust revenues you cover the country with a swarm of hungry officials who incite riot and strife, who frequently arrest the innocent and subject them to innumerable annoyances and heavy personal expense. These outrageous revenue laws can never be repealed so long as this national debt remains. We have labored diligently to reduce appropriations, and have succeeded in some measure, but with the single exception of the reduction of the tax on manufactured tobacco, where is the burden that has been lightened or the duty that has been remitted? I boldly assert that we cannot, to any considerable extent, reduce taxation. These burdens must continue, and the holders of these bonds, for whose benefit the tax is levied, will continue to impose it upon our agricultural industries.

This debt is a national irritant. It is a sectional irritant. It is not only held almost entirely in our great northern money centers, but it is a constant reminder of sectional war. Why did you wisely decide to strike from your flags the names of the battle-fields of the late war? Because they would remind us of strife and fraternal bloodshed. Because their continuance would tend to transmit to the next generation memories which should be buried with this generation.

We want no sectional irritant. We must have a union of hearts. We must be one in fact as we are in name. This sectional estrangement is blasting this beautiful land. Nature designed us to be an indivisible Union. We are linked together for all time, and to continue this sectional irritant now means that we intend to make it an hereditary irritant. Its continuance makes perpetual the national banking system. This banking system is founded upon this debt. The funding and banking systems mutually sustain each other; they are inseparable, and you cannot strike down the one until you cancel and discharge the other. These banks, as the embodiment of the money-power, have instigated all the measures of contraction of the currency which have crushed labor in this country. They are rapidly becoming in this Government the power which is greater than the Government. Their continuance means the continuance of a centralized money influence, which will spread more extensively from year to year its destructive agencies through all the political machinery of the Government, and which will in the end hazard, if it does not destroy, the liberties of the people.

In 1871, when refunding of the national debt commenced, these banks held nearly four hundred millions of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, and from that date to the present time they have held more than one-fifth of the interest-bearing debt of the United States. One of these banks in New York last year, by handling 4 per cent. bonds, is said to have paid 120 per cent. dividends and carried half a million to its surplus account. Here is their power. Here is their connection with this debt.

The Comptroller of the Currency says in his last report: "The credit of the Government is now such that it is not improbable that before the 4 per cent. bonds mature the present debt may be refunded into 3½ per cent. bonds." Here is the intimation that when thirty years elapse this debt must be continued indefinitely for the benefit of this moneyed corporation, or made perpetual, so as to fasten for all time upon our people this corrupting agency.

There is a provision in the present bill which intimates that this refunding scheme is looking to the continuance of this banking system. From and after the 1st day of July, 1880, the 3½ per cent. bonds authorized by the act are to be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation; that is, the bonds having the longest time to run and which, from their low rate of interest, will be least likely to excite popular objection. Reconcile the people to the system by the flattering unctious that they pay a low rate of interest to enable these corporations to coin fortunes; remove the prejudice against banks by removing opposition to a national debt!

The Comptroller also, quoting the language of a former Secretary of the Treasury, says, "these banks will be a firm anchorage to the Union of States." They can only anchor the States to a centralized aristocracy destructive of all liberty. These banks anchor the States to this Union! Yes, sir, like the piratical craft, with its black flag and heavy guns, bearing down upon a rich, unarmed East Indian, as soon as the Ishmaelite of the high seas comes within grappling distance of that rich freight the grappling-irons are fastened into its sides and it is held firmly until robbery, plunder, and spoliation have done their work, and then the despoiled ship is left to float away a helpless and worthless thing, the sport of wind and wave. So these banks will anchor the States to this Union; they will thrust their political and monetary influences into the sides of these States and hold them steady until their labor and productions, their lands and houses—all their wealth—become a sacrifice acceptable to this money power.

This national debt is Pandora's box, from which already proceed unnumbered evils, political and social, public and private, and these must increase in number as they multiply their power for mischief.

If refunding was necessary, of course I would support the measure which contemplates the lowest rate of interest. I have no doubt a bond of 3½ per cent. can be sold by the Government. The present premium upon the 4 per cent. bonds and the immense profits made by the national banks in disposing of them, and the great readiness with which the certificates were sold, all prove that a bond as provided for in the committee's bill can be sold at par. Even if that bond was made a five-forty bond instead of a twenty-forty bond, the supply would not equal the demand for safe and permanent securities.

But, sir, I am opposed to every description of an interest-bearing debt in this Government. An interest-bearing debt always takes the form of a permanent loan, and a permanent loan, I repeat, is nothing but a mortgage upon the wealth and industry of the country. It is the only form of indebtedness by which heavy and durable incumbrance can be laid upon the country.

It may be asked, what would the Government do in times of war or when sudden and unexpected emergencies demanded large and unprovided-for expenditures? I answer, I would meet those expenditures by using the credit of the Government, without interest. I would do as this Government did during the late civil war—meet the necessities of the Government by issuing legal-tender United States notes. You sent your agents to Europe to sell your interest-bearing bonds and you received in payment therefor your own paper currency. You sold your bonds to the citizens of this country and received in payment your legal-tender notes. You met every demand upon the resources of the country with these notes. You paid your soldiers with these notes. You purchased your ordnance and commissary stores with these notes. You met your entire civil and military lists of expenditures with this paper currency. It was the promise of the Government to pay, without interest, that carried you successfully and triumphantly through the late war. That flag floats there above your head to-day the emblem of a great nation in response to the power of the greenback.

It was valuable because it was the pledged faith of the nation, and it was especially in demand because it was by act of Congress a legal tender for all dues both public and private. Your Supreme Court decided that it was a constitutional act which made these notes a legal tender, and I am persuaded that while it remains an incorruptible court it will never reverse that decision.

Whence comes this clamor against our paper currency, that Congress has no constitutional power in time of peace to recognize as a legal tender that which the Constitution permits and authorizes as such in times of war? Where is the constitutional authority for saying that Congress can make nothing but gold and silver a legal tender either in peace or war? States are prohibited from making "anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts;" but the Federal Government in all matters relating to finance is sovereign within constitutional limitations, and to "coin money and regulate the value thereof" is clearly one of its granted powers.

No, sir, it is the legal-tender character of the United States notes which keeps them at par with gold and silver; abrogate that character and the advocates of the proposition know that their wish to render them worthless becomes an accomplished fact; they know that it is equivalent to their retirement, that it is a practical contraction of the currency to the extent of $346,000,000, a contraction which drives the laboring-man back to beggary, cripples all our industries, arrests all enterprise, and throws a cloud over the future of our country.

What did this Government gain by the creation of this enormous interest-bearing debt? For, as I have stated, the success of the Government was achieved by its paper currency, and not by its bonds. What benefits have accrued to the country? I answer, you have built up a moneyed class to feed and fatten on the laboring class. You have exposed the legislation of the country to the corrupting influences of this moneyed class. You have diverted millions of capital from the productive industries of the country, and converted that capital into a stationary and inactive investment fund. You have also established a banking system by these bonds which is ruinous to our industries through their power to expand or contract the volume of the currency.

You demonetized silver and made gold a single standard of values in response to the clamor of these bondholders, thereby bringing on a panic in our financial affairs which impoverished the world to the amount of unnumbered billions.

All this you have accomplished because you did not rely during the conduct of the war upon the credit of the Government without interest.

Having created this bonded debt, what shall we do with it? Pay it. When? Now as far as we are able, and the whole as soon and as rapidly as the resources of the Government will permit. In what kind of money will you pay this debt? In coin, as the law requires. How?

First. By cutting off all unnecessary expenditures of the Government. We must never forget that it is the excess of revenue above expenditure which is the only real sinking fund by which public debts can be discharged. The increase of the revenues and the diminution of expenses are the only means by which this sinking fund can be enlarged. We must remember that the payment of a great debt like this implies self-denial, retrenchment, and economy. Extravagant salaries must be reduced; sinecure positions must be abolished; the swarm of idle officials about these two Houses of Congress must be put to work or sent home. The multitudes which crowd the Government Departments must be taught that more work and less pay are the requirements of the future. We must have no more roving commissions, no more itinerant committees for investigation, which committees are frequently created to provide for clerks, messengers, reporters, and traveling expenses for pleasure-seekers. We must have no more subsidies; no more arrearages of pensions or bills for the equalization of bounties. Economy must be practiced everywhere, until this mortgage upon the income of the Government is satisfied.

Second. By the unlimited coinage of standard silver dollars. The Director of the Mint reports that the total production of the precious metals in this country for the year 1879 was $79,712,000, of which $38,900,000 was gold and $40,812,000 silver. He also says that on the 31st of last October there was in the country coin and bullion to the amount of $481,691,069, of which only $126,009,537 was silver. He also says that by the 30th of next June the metallic circulation of this country will have swollen to over $600,000,000.

Now, I submit that a country producing this vast metallic treasure every year, and with mines which promise to be inexhaustible for generations to come, should find no difficulty in discharging at maturity a debt of $782,000,000 in coin. The great obstacle is not a scarcity of the precious metals, but an unwillingness on the part of the Government, moved and instigated by the money power, to recognize silver on a debt-paying equality with gold.

The remonetization of silver has been a wonderful factor in the revival of business throughout the country. Conjoined with the large influx of gold from Europe, it has sent joy and gladness throughout the land. It has brightened homes which were enshrouded in darkness. It has lifted some of our industries out of the "slough of despond," and started the whole nation once more in the race for wealth and power.

Did I not hear it asserted on this floor during the Forty-fourth Congress that if silver was remonetized all the gold in the country would be driven out by the baser metal, silver? But the very moment you retouched and revived the old coin, like a magnet of immense attractive power it drew gold from the four quarters of the earth, and emptied it in your coffers. Did I not hear it asserted that if you remonetized silver that your bonds would come back from Europe, and the credit of the Government would sink below par? But the moment the dollar of "our fathers" was rescued from the grave where the bondholders had buried it, your bonds advanced in price, and the four percents could not supply the demands in Europe and the United States. False prophets! How can they have the effrontery to croak their evil predictions now that honest men are asking for the unlimited coinage of silver? We are told by these croakers that the free coinage of silver would soon reduce its current value to its bullion value, and thus establish a single silver standard, and that to prevent this it is necessary for the Government to hold in its vaults the great body of silver coin.

Now, I submit that it is the debt-paying value of silver which constitutes its current or money value and not its commercial value which will keep it on an equality with gold. So long as the law-making power of the United States decrees that a silver dollar of 412½ grains is equivalent to the gold dollar in discharging a debt of one hundred cents, so long will this dollar of the Constitution, this dollar of "our fathers," be on an equality with gold. Then coin it to the extent of your mint capacity. Then, if necessary, increase your mint capacity so that all the silver bullion which can be purchased by the Government may be converted into coin by which we can cancel our national indebtedness. There never was a greater fraud perpetrated upon the productive classes of any country than the demonetization of silver by the American Congress, and I hope and believe that by its complete restoration to the position assigned it in the Constitution the silver dollar will yet be the great coin which will free us from debt, elevate and enrich our laboring classes, and make our vast territory the happy and prosperous home of millions of freemen. Why should we wait for an international agreement on a common ratio between gold and silver? Why should we wait for all countries to establish a bimetallic money when our commercial and agricultural resources not only authorize and capacitate us to be a "law unto ourselves," but in some measure to dictate financial laws to the civilized world. I repeat, coin this silver in unlimited quantities, and for every $10 or the multiple thereof thus coined issue your certificate, and therewith pay this debt, or if the bondholder prefers it, let him have the coin represented by this certificate. Then require the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange legal-tender notes for silver bullion so long as it can be purchased at or below par. I am willing to admit that resumption of specie payments is nominally a success and we must maintain it. The country is pleased with the fallacious thought that we have a convertible currency, and we must not interfere with the pleasing reflection. But since resumption commenced one year ago we are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that only $11,256,678 of United States notes have been presented for redemption. The people care nothing for specie; they would rather have the simple promise of the Government to pay than to be weighted down with gold and silver. But we must sustain this nominal resumption; preserve this equality, this imaginary convertibility; and so long as bullion can be purchased at par with legal-tender notes so long is the equality of the two maintained, and resumption of specie payments is a successful experiment.

Again, let the Secretary of the Treasury be required to use the surplus gold and silver coin now accumulated in the Treasury and that which may hereafter accumulate there for the purchase of these bonds. We are informed that at this time there is gold and silver coin and bullion in the United States Treasury to the amount of $225,133,558. Of this sum let 25 per cent. of the outstanding legal-tenders, or $56,000,000, remain in the Treasury for redemption purposes, and that will enable us at this time to apply $139,000,000 of this specie toward the cancellation of this funded debt. We are told that specie to the amount of 40 per cent. of the United States notes must be retained for the redemption of those notes; but I submit that, in view of the fact that only about eleven millions were needed during the last twelve months for redemption, there is no probability that a run will be made upon the Treasury for many generations to come to the amount of 25 per cent. of our legal-tenders. No, sir, there should not be an idle dollar or a surplus dollar in the Treasury of the United States. An idle dollar in a free, representative government is worse than an idle brain; surplus money there is worse than a thousand inactive hands. It becomes a "corruption fund" capable of incalculable mischief, and besides is a tangible demonstration of oppression and fraud on the part of the Government toward the tax-payers. Hoarding gold and silver when we owe $1,996,414,905 and paid interest last year to the amount of $101,453,118!

I assert, sir, that this maturing debt can all be discharged within the next ten years. The great increase of our revenues over the estimates, as submitted by the Secretary, and the probability that they will continue to increase as the country grows under the present prosperity, authorizes us to assert that from the excess of revenues over our expenditures under an economical administration of the Government we can cancel this debt without increasing taxation or without inflation of our paper currency beyond an equality with gold and silver.

Instead of reducing interest only 1 and 2 per cent., which is valuable and desirable, and making that a plausible excuse for perpetuating this debt, I desire to wipe out all this interest, amounting on these maturing bonds to over $40,000,000 per annum, and apply the money thus saved to the extinguishment of the remaining portion of the national debt. Thus within the next quarter of a century the present generation can settle its own accounts, adjust and balance its books, and transmit this splendid estate of liberty and wealth, of power and intelligence, unencumbered to its posterity.

The dream of ancient empire never conceived the power and glory of such a government as this. Cyrus, Alexander, and Augustus Caesar are all dwarfed when their thrones are compared with this heritage of popular liberty. Modern European nations, with their dismembered territory, their distant provinces, their vast standing armies, their pauper population, their intolerable burdens, their effete political systems, their fully developed resources, having no future, they all, separately and collectively, shrink beside this last western home of civilization. Like the sun coming out from his eastern chambers and prepared in strength and beauty to run his race, so this country is preparing for its future. We have only witnessed the dews and clouds of its morning hours. We are upon the threshold of the inner temple. Our posterity are to reap the promised rewards. Let us labor for those who are to come after us, and as money is one of the grand agencies in building and garnishing this home of unborn millions, let us take the capital now invested in these bonds and put it to work among the people in mines, in factories, in workshops, in railroads, in ships, in grain and cotton fields, in schools and colleges, in all the thoroughfares of business, and thus make our country all that enlightened statesmanship could suggest, all that an intelligent patriotism could seek after or desire.

Mr. FRYE. While following to-day immediately the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FELTON,] it is not for the purpose of undertaking to reply to his argument. There are many things in the very able speech which he has just made that excite my earnest commendation. I congratulate him upon his fidelity to governmental integrity, upon his eloquence, and able recognition of the fact that a nation must be a nation of integrity if it expects its public men to be men of integrity. I congratulate the gentleman from Georgia also that he is almost although not altogether a hard-money man. I congratulate him, too, that he is almost persuaded to be a republican, although not quite.

I purpose rather to reply, to a certain extent, to the able speech of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] delivered in this House a few days since. I do not join issue with the gentleman's argument so far as it is strictly confined to the pending bill. I recognize him as the leader of that side of the House, as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. I recognize him, too, as a hard-money democrat, a very remarkable species in modern days; but I also recognize the fact that while his speech was sound almost entirely, yet he found it absolutely necessary, as a democrat and the leader of that side of the House, to scatter through it democratic poison.

I do not join issue with the gentleman from New York on the bill which, under the instructions of the Committee on Ways and Means, he has reported to this House so far as its main features are concerned. In the proposition to issue a 3½ per cent. bond, payable in twenty years, I concur with the majority of the committee.

I was originally in favor of the first proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] to issue a 3½ per cent. bond, payable in fifty years. I believe that a bond like that would be eagerly sought as a means of making permanent investment of idle capital, and that it could be floated easily at par. The whole amount to be invested would not be over $500,000,000, and the payment of that amount, it seems to me, might well and reasonably be postponed even to the extent of fifty years. But we were overruled by the committee, and for reasons which the gentleman from Georgia has, to a certain extent, given to this House to-day.

Many gentlemen on the committee are opposed to perpetuating, as they call it, the debt of the United States; opposed to binding upon the people a burden which will last for fifty years. They drew vivid, beautiful, and refreshing pictures of the magnificent prosperity of our country, of the humming wheels of industry, of the busy men and women, of the great iron and steel works, of expanding railroads and so on, assuring us that with this superabundant prosperity, within less than thirty years, the whole debt would inevitably be paid.

I believe that the picture of prosperity which they drew is undoubtedly a true one. And, oh! it is refreshing to see certain gentlemen drawing these beautiful pictures of the country under resumption, who painted such horrible daubs of dismay, destruction, despair, and death but a month or six weeks before resumption took place, prophetic of what was to happen if there ever should be such a thing in fact as resumption. I recognize with joy this renewed prosperity of the country; I am glad to see it back again; I hope it will stay. But does history justify any such sanguine predictions? What do these gentlemen think? Do they suppose that the balance of trade will be in our favor for thirty successive years? Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FELTON] suppose that there is to be an Irish famine every year for thirty years? Does he suppose that there are to be short crops in Europe for thirty years? Does he suppose that God will smile upon this country, and give us abounding crops every year for thirty years? Does he suppose that there are to be no panics, no business depressions, no hard times within the next thirty years? Does he suppose that even if prosperity lasts there are to be no extraordinary expenditures in this great Republic induced by this good fortune? Are there to be no wars and no rumors of wars?

Is the old ship of state to enjoy calm seas and favorable winds? Are there to be no rocks, no lee shores, and no tempests?

It seems to me that history warrants no such conclusion, and I believe that in fifty years from to-day, whether we continue prosperous or not, we shall find that it would have been a safe thing to have funded five hundred millions of our present debt at 3½ per cent. interest. Yet, yielding to the gentlemen on the committee, I gave up that proposition, and submitted to and voted for the one contained in the pending bill. Yet the gentleman from Georgia says that the bill ought not to be passed. Why not? Because the rate of interest is too high? No; he agrees that the rate of interest, 3½ per cent., is right. But he contends the bill ought not to be passed because we ought not to postpone the payment of this debt twenty years. Why, Mr. Chairman, are we to pay this debt in twenty years? Is it possible for us to pay it in twenty years, and relieve the people from burdens which the gentleman from Georgia so earnestly prays they may be relieved from? No man hopes for that unless you resort to that crazy scheme of setting the printing-presses to work and paying the debt in irredeemable paper money.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman pardon a brief question? Are we not now paying the debt at a rate which would extinguish it in a great deal less than twenty years, and without "setting the printing-presses to work?"

Mr. WARNER. In less than ten years.

Mr. KELLEY. Less than twenty years, I put it.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] in his carefully prepared speech says, that during the period from 1875 to 1879, inclusive, we have increased the debt. If that is true, I ask how long it will take to pay the national debt?

Mr. KELLEY. That is not an answer to my question. I aver that at the rate at which we have paid that debt in this fiscal year, when people are not especially complaining of heavy taxation, it will disappear in fifteen years.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt it is true that if the rate at which we have been paying the public debt within the last six months should be continued for twenty years, it will pay the debt. But is there a man on this earth so crazy as to believe that the prosperity of the last six months is to last for twenty years?

Mr. KELLEY. Will not the payments of this fiscal year diminish the permanent interest fund more than $3,000,000 and give us that amount of money with which to buy bonds next year?

Mr. FRYE. But does not the gentleman know that already the balance of trade is changing? Is the famine to last next year? Are the short crops in Europe to continue?

Mr. KELLEY rose.

Mr. FRYE. I am not putting these questions to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. I thought you were. I rose to answer them.

Mr. FRYE. As I am progressing in my speech I am answering very much that I have heard the gentleman say heretofore. I like the sanguine spirit of the gentleman. He has received new light within the last year and a half; and it is a glorious light; it makes his face shine now like that of an angel though a year and a half ago in the light of approaching resumption it looked like that of the devil. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Because all my prophecies have been confirmed. With the stoppage of the cancellation of greenbacks and the remonetization of silver the period of depression is ended and our prosperity has made a "boom" throughout the world. The greenbackers and the silver men have redeemed the country. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Have they increased the number of bushels of corn to the acre or the number of potatoes to the hill?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think I will not undertake now to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia, as I was saying, insists that this debt must be paid before; that you must not put off the payment for twenty years. He forgets that ten years from now we have bonds becoming redeemable, which we can take care of with our surplus revenue until the twenty-year bonds become redeemable; and it will occupy our full time and the full extent of our resources to do this.

But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is another proposition in this bill which ought to be amended. I believe an original proposition of mine was that there should be provided a short bond with which to bridge over the ten years between now and the time when the 4½ per cent. bonds are redeemable. That proposition commended itself to the committee; and this bill provides for a short bond to take care of about $250,000,000. This is a short bond redeemable after two years. The rate of interest which it seemed to me this bond should bear was 4 per cent. Why 4 per cent. when the other bonds are to bear 3½ per cent? Because it is well known to all financiers, I believe—it is argued by them all, at any rate—that a long bond at 3½ per cent. is better than a short bond at the same rate of interest. I think the gentleman from New York recognizes this principle of finance in his speech which I have before me.

Now, sir, if we could sell a 3½ per cent. twenty-year bond at par and no more, can we sell for refunding purposes a 3½ per cent. two-year bond? I believe not; I am afraid not; and therefore I would desire to see that short bond amended and made a 3.65 or 4 per cent. Another thing, Mr. Speaker. Our bill, as I believe it is reported to the House, restricts the Secretary of the Treasury to exchanging these bonds. I believe that ought not to be. I believe it will absolutely prevent his success in refunding with these short bonds at any rate, and he ought by an amendment to the bill to have the right to sell and buy others with the proceeds of the sale.

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him on that point?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLISLE. According to my construction of this bill the Secretary of the Treasury will not be permitted to sell any of these bonds for money before the maturity of the outstanding bonds which are to be refunded, but during that time can only exchange on certain terms specified in the bill. But after the maturity of the outstanding bonds he can sell these bonds for money, and with that money redeem the matured bonds.

Mr. FRYE. I may be wrong, but my recollection is that he is only authorized to exchange. If the gentleman is correct, it still seems to me that he ought to be empowered to sell and anticipate the time when they would become redeemable.

Mr. CARLISLE. I will not interrupt the gentleman further.

Mr. FRYE. In other particulars I do not know that I have any disagreement with the Committee on Ways and Means in relation to this bill which has been reported. I shall vote for the bill; I shall vote for it in the belief that it will prove a success, and that the bonds within the coming two years will be refunded at this low rate of interest.

And, sir, I believe this country in the next one hundred years will not see a time when the rate of interest will be lower than 3½ per cent. There is, sir, a "hard-pan" in interest as well as in everything else, and I believe when we struck 3½ per cent. we struck that "hard-pan." I am aware, sir, that England puts its consols upon the market bearing 3 per cent. interest, but I am not aware they ever sold one of them at par except one single issue of a very small amount, and I believe the interest to-day costs England at least 3½ per cent. I am aware that France put upon the market 3 per cent. bonds, but I am equally aware they sold down to sixty cents on the dollar, and that the average rate of interest to-day is at least 5 per cent. on French bonds, counting the discount. We can improve on France, but I shall be entirely content if in this matter of interest we stand side by side with England.

I desire now, Mr. Speaker, especially to call attention to portions of the speech—and it is an exceedingly able one—of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] where I do join issue with him. On page 6 of his printed speech, which I have before me, he gives a table showing the amount of unmatured interest-bearing bonds outstanding; and then, right at the bottom of the table he says:

The total debt, less cash in the Treasury, on January 1, 1880, was $2,011,798,504.

Then he adds, and I want these words to be marked:

It will be seen that there has been no reduction of the debt in the past five years, both the debt and the interest charge having been increased; this has not been caused by any extraordinary demands upon the Treasury.

Again, further down:

But, from erroneous policy or some other cause, the national obligations have been increased, although the rate of taxation has been rigidly adhered to.

Now, what does the gentleman from New York mean by that? Does he mean a play upon the words "debt" and "bonded debt"? Does he mean that the people of this country shall be deceived by that play upon words.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Does the gentleman desire an answer at this time?

Mr. FRYE. I do not. Does not the gentleman know that the debt of the country has been decreased every year since 1866—that there is not one single year the debt has not been decreased? There may have been times when the bonded debt of the country has been increased. I admit it. How could you sell $95,000,000 of bonds for resumption purpose without increasing the bonded debt? But your money drawn from them was in the Treasury of the United States, and your net debt was no more.

He does not say the bonded debt of the country has increased, but "the debt of the country has increased within the last five years." I have received four letters within a week from my district, asking whether it was true, as the gentleman from New York stated, that the debt of the United States has been increased during the last five years, that is, from 1875 to 1879. Why, Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that the debt has been decreased every year since we started upon its payment, and I will print the table in my speech, taken directly from the Secretary's books, conclusively showing this:

Statement showing the amount of the principal of the public debt, (exclusive of accrued interest,) less cash in the Treasury, from its highest point, August 31, 1865, to March 1, 1880; with the annual reduction thereon.

March 1, 1880.....	1,977,995,433 81	18,419,471 22
Total.....	778,436,137 62

Reference to this table shows that there has been a reduction from 1875 to 1879, inclusive, and these are the years referred to by the gentleman from New York. There has been a decrease of $93,626,265, up to March 1, 1880, from the date the gentleman named, 1875, and up to February 1, of $112,045,737.

Again he says in the same statement "there have been no extraordinary expenditures during that time." I say to the gentleman from New York that there have been extraordinary expenditures, and I give here a table showing that there have been about $19,000,000 of extraordinary expenditures during that time covered by his statement:

Extraordinary expenses during the fiscal years from 1875 to 1879, inclusive.

1875:
Awards to British claimants.....	$1,929,819 00
Payment of interest on 3.65 bonds of District of Columbia.....	154,554 64

Arrears of pensions.....	5,373,000 00
Sinking fund of Pacific railroads.....	328,078 21
Completion of Washington Monument.....	50,983 07
Education of the blind.....	250,000 00
Redemption of District of Columbia securities.....	342,714 73
Total.....	18,243,780 78

Now, I believe the people of this country are entitled to the facts. They are not to be bothered or deluded with this "debt and bonded debt," this play upon words, this trifling with terms. A debt is a debt whether it is "bonded" or "unbonded;" and the debt of the country is precisely as I now have stated it.

Again, I wish to call the attention of the country to page 8 of the gentleman's speech, where he thinks the Secretary of the Treasury is considerably confused about the amount of bonds sold for resumption purposes. He gives a table showing the amount sold and cost of the same and the interest of the same, making the whole interest and the cost a certain sum; and on page 9, where he sums up his remarkable conclusions, "there has been $6,000,000 of the legal-tenders redeemed"—the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FELTON] says $11,500,000—"which it has cost $13,408,744 to redeem. This was an expensive operation."

I am exceedingly surprised that so distinguished a gentleman as the leader of the democratic side and chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means should permit that to go out to this country as a statement of facts. "Six millions of legal-tenders have been redeemed at a cost of thirteen and a half millions of dollars." Then, says the gentleman, "Is not this an expensive operation?" Why, the gentleman further on in his speech says "resumption is a fixed fact." Further on he says "resumption was a necessity." Further on he finds himself "entirely in accord" with resumption. Further on he says that "no man wants gold." Why? "Because he knows he can get it." Ah, there is the secret. I say to the gentleman from New York if it cost $13,000,000 to redeem $6,000,000 the moment men knew that they could get it they did not present their bills for redemption because the bills were better than the gold and more convenient for their purposes. But suppose that there had been only $13,000,000 in gold in the Treasury for redemption purposes, does he suppose it would have cost only $13,000,000 to redeem $6,000,000? Why the thirteen millions would have been drawn in a single day. Every man would have wanted gold, because it was not.

Why, sir, that $13,000,000 has brought to this country the magnificent condition and the extraordinary prosperity of to-day. That is what resumption has accomplished. That $13,000,000 has made the greenback of the country receivable at par in every great commercial center in all the wide world. That has brought about to a large extent the present financial standing of the country at home and abroad. That $13,000,000 has brought about this equalization between gold and silver, national bank notes, and greenbacks. And is it a heavy price to pay? Does the gentleman think it has cost too much? Is he willing to concede that all the magnificent prosperity of this country which has resulted from this has cost too dearly?

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. I cannot yield for a question now.

Mr. WARNER. I would simply like to ask the gentleman if this is the whole cost of resumption, this $13,000,000?

Mr. FRYE. That is what the gentleman from New York gave to be the cost up to the present time, including interests and all. He states the costs and says "the Secretary is confused," and that as a matter of fact over $105,000,000 of bonds were sold for resumption purposes. I point him to page 74 of the Finance Report of 1879. Then I ask him to take the provisions of the first section of the resumption act, and what does he find? He finds that the Department is required to coin, as soon as practicable, small silver for the redemption of fractional notes; and having no surplus revenues with which to buy the silver, there were sold at once 5 per cent. bonds in the amount of $15,215,500. In 1876 an additional amount of $2,278,650 was sold, making in all $17,494,150. Subsequently there were sold to accumulate coin for the redemption of United States notes, of 4½ per cent. bonds $65,000,000, and of 4 per cent. bonds $30,500,000, including $5,500,000 rendered necessary by the depletion of cash in the Treasury on account of payment of the Halifax award. This would make the amount of bonds sold under the resumption act $112,994,150; but of the amount sold for coin with which to redeem the legal-tender notes there were but $95,500,000, and of this $5,500,000 was made necessary by the Halifax award payment, as before stated, a mistake of only ten millions of dollars made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee!

I wish to call the attention of the House to another point made by the gentleman. He says:

For the purpose of strengthening the public credit at the commencement of the war and giving confidence to those who were disposed to become Government creditors, a so-called "sinking fund" was established, which was immediately disregarded, even by those who had created it, and which has been irregularly complied with since.

That is in the letter true; in the spirit, not so. The payments on the debt have met the requirements of this sinking fund and exceeded them by $300,000,000. The amount of the sinking fund January 1, 1880, computed with reinvestment at 6 per cent. per annum upon the total of the debt since January 1, 1866, would be $472,243,621, while the amount actually paid on the debt is nearly $800,000,000. Now, if that is not a compliance with the requirements of the sinking fund in spirit, and more, too, then I do not understand what compliance may be.

Again—now for a little of the gentleman's democratic poison—he says:

The Finance Report of 1865 states that the average interest on $1,725,000,000 of the debt was 6.62 per cent. The management of the public debt from that period has not been the best that could have been devised.

That may be. I am inclined to think that an omnipotent power perhaps might have devised a better way. But hear the conclusion:

There has not been a stable policy founded on principles of enlightened statesmanship.

And yet in the same speech, coming from the Committee on Ways and Means, with a full chance of the completest investigation, the gentleman says:

It is evident that the United States has far greater natural resources to meet its obligations than Great Britain or any other nation.

And that, too, notwithstanding four years of the most dreadful war that ever visited any land on this earth and a debt in 1865 of almost $3,000,000,000, and no "stable," "enlightened" policy financially. And the gentleman further says:

She stands even now in the beginning of her national existence as the creditor nation of the world. All that is necessary to maintain supremacy is wisdom, caution, and good faith.

What a position to be attained to by this young Republic, which, according to the gentleman, has had no stable and enlightened financial policy. Again:

Our credit is firmly established on the best basis. It is recognized and admitted by timid and conservative investors in public funds who hazard nothing at any time and under no inducements.

Again:

The rate of 3½ per cent., which is proposed, is a conservative proposition. As to its feasibility of successful accomplishment I have no doubt.

And yet that has been accomplished without any stable or enlightened financial policy on the part of this Government!

Why, Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without calling the attention of the gentleman from New York and the country to our marvelous financial history of the last twenty years; nor without claiming that a success unparalleled in the world's experience is largely due to the patriotism, fidelity, and steadfastness of the republican party. Like a rock it has stood firmly against the waves of folly, inflation, and repudiation, saving from their overflow the financial integrity of the nation.

What does the record show? During the last democratic administration, under the act of December, 1860, Treasury notes were issued and sold to the amount of $10,010,900, at a rate of interest from 6 to 12 per cent., nearly five millions of them at 12 per cent. Other offers were received ranging from 15 to 36 per cent., and refused. Under the act of February, 1861, a loan of twenty-five millions of United States sixes, on twenty years' time, was offered, about eighteen and a half millions sold at a fraction over eighty-nine cents on the dollar, and the balance withdrawn.

"So low had the credit of the Government fallen that the Secretary of the Treasury, in January, 1861, suggested to Congress, as a financial resource, that the several States be asked, as security for the repayment of any money the Government might find it necessary to borrow, to pledge the deposits received by them from the Government under the act for the distribution of the surplus revenues in 1836; the Secretary believing that a loan contracted on such a basis of security, superadding to the plighted faith of the United States that of the individual States, could hardly fail to be acceptable to capitalists."

Before March, 1861, seven States had seceded; a confederate government had organized; their president and vice-president had been elected; their congress had convened; an army had been raised; General Twiggs had surrendered United States troops in Texas; and a democratic President of the United States had impotently yielded, by the declaration that under our Constitution there was no power in Congress or elsewhere to coerce a seceded State. March 4, 1861, the republican party came into possession. Into possession of what? Of a disorganized, dismembered Republic, with its forts, arsenals, navy-yards, soldiers, mints, custom-houses, and post-offices, seized by an enemy, without any efficient army, with its little navy scattered to the four corners of the earth, and with this bankrupt Treasury. But it was equal to the occasion. It raised a mighty army; equipped, supplied, and kept it in the field for four years; built and manned a navy great enough to blockade the whole southern coast.

During the war it expended more than $4,000,000,000 obtained by taxing a willing people and borrowing from a cautious public. In 1862 unpaid soldiers in the field and unpaid requisitions on the table of the Secretary of the Treasury compelled it to resort to the dangerous expedient of issuing legal-tender notes. Then followed the acts of February and July, 1862, and of March, 1863, providing for the issue of four hundred and fifty millions of the well-known "greenbacks." Rapid depreciation followed, and the greater the depreciation the greater the necessity for more. What should be done? There was a beaten path trodden by the world before. It was easy to take that, and the temptation was fearful to set again the printing presses at work and make the money so much required. But the republican party, with a sagacity such as the world had never seen before and a courage no nation or party had ever manifested, stopped, called a halt, and enacted into law its solemn declaration—

Nor shall the total amount of United States notes issued or to be issued ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of the temporary loan.

This declaration, made in the midst of distress, necessity, and almost overwhelming temptation, was the citadel of the financial integrity of the Republic, and the assaults upon it have been frequent and fierce. There have been foes without always, sometimes weak friends within. The democratic party, denouncing the issue of these notes when they were necessary to save the life of the nation, with a strange inconsistency has clamored at its gates for more when peace had been secured and safety made certain. An army of greenbackers, with banners, has assailed it. With ranks recruited from weak, vacillating, and disappointed republicans, swollen to respectability in numbers by the unprincipled followers of a false light called democracy, it has made assault after assault. At one time there was weakness within the walls, and timid counsels threatened its overthrow, but shortly weakness succumbed to strength and timidity gave way before courage. Every assault from without has been repelled, every danger from within averted, and the financial integrity of the country has been preserved. The danger has passed, and now even a time-serving democracy shouts vigorously for hard money—so vigorously that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] charges it with treachery, and threatens its destruction.

The "greenback" worth almost as much as gold the day it was first issued, gradually sinking in value until it fell to thirty-eight cents on a dollar, through the fidelity, sagacity, and courage of the republican party has appreciated until to-day it is receivable at par with gold in every great commercial center of the world. This achievement is without a parallel in history. Fearful of the effect upon our credit of the issue of paper money with no provision for its redemption, the light of experience disclosing only repudiation in the end, the republican party in Congress, February 22, 1862, wisely enacted what is now section 3694 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 3694. The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue to be paid into the Treasury.

This was virtually a promise to pay interest on our bonds in coin, and to provide for the gradual extinction of the principal in the same. This law, wise and healthy as it was, has met with a like experience to that of the limitation upon the issue of legal-tender notes. It has been reviled, execrated, and fiercely denounced. Piteous appeals have been made in behalf of the greenback, "the savior of our liberties;" charges hurled at us that we have dishonored them by refusing ourselves to receive them for customs dues; specious pleas entered in every hamlet in the land that we, with the same hand that scattered them abroad, branded them with disgrace; anathemas proclaimed from every platform against us as the father who sends his own child into the world and stamps upon his brow the infamy of illegitimacy.

Legislative attempts to destroy the validity of this statute have been frequent, by requiring the receipt of legal-tender notes for customs dues, by authorizing the payment of interest on the public debt in the same, by an unlimited issue of irredeemable paper money for the payment of both principal and interest of the debt, by every strange scheme that could emanate from the disordered brains of crazy men. They seemed to forget or recklessly to ignore the fact that this law was a vital part of every such contract entered into by our Government after its enactment; that a disregard of its provisions would be bold and disgraceful repudiation. The republican party never forgot, but earnestly and persistently stood by the law, maintained through good report and ill report, through prosperity and adversity, through flush times and through panics, that the financial integrity of the nation should be preserved, that its contracts should be kept, that its promises should be redeemed in both letter and spirit. Its success is evidenced by section 3694, in our Revised Statutes, the law enacted in 1862, not an i dotted nor a t crossed, changed, or modified; in no respect other than it may be held to be modified by the resumption act.

The repeal of this law during the war would have destroyed our credit and given success to the enemies of the Government. Its repeal or essential modification since the war would have dishonored us in the eyes of the world and made our vast expenditure of blood and money a mere wicked waste. Thanks to an overruling Providence, to the patriotism of our people, to the valor of our soldiers, and to the sagacity of our statesmen, the war ended, peace was restored, and the Republic preserved. Then we at once looked to our financial condition. The war had been long, its demands upon the energies and resources of the people fearful, the expenditures enormous, the strain upon the public credit terrible. We balanced the books and found, August 31, 1865, our debt as follows:

Four percents.....	$618,127 98
Five percents.....	269,175,727 65
Six percents.....	1,291,736,439 33
Seven and three-tenths percents.....	830,000,000 00
	$2,381,530,294 96
Debt not bearing interest.....	463,119,331 60
Total.....	2,844,649,626 56
Less cash in the Treasury.....	88,218,055 13
Net debt.....	2,756,431,571 43

Annual interest charge..... 150,977,697 87

This was the highest point of indebtedness reached, and was a sum total, well calculated to dismay the people and seriously disturb our creditors.

To give courage to the former and restore confidence to the latter was the first problem to be solved. The republican party determined to accomplish both, by commencing at once to pay the debt, and under their auspices the Government applied to this purpose the surplus revenues, and made the following reductions:

Fiscal year.	Reduction.	Fiscal year.	Reduction.
1866.....	$120,395,407 59	1874.....	$1,312,907 06
1867.....	127,884,952 15	1875.....	14,107,953 56
1868.....	27,297,798 46	1876.....	29,115,829 88
1869.....	48,081,540 14	1877.....	41,649,908 88
1870.....	101,601,916 88	1878.....	19,893,150 92
1871.....	84,175,887 54	1879.....	3,967,375 42
1872.....	97,213,538 32	1880, to February 1.....	26,423,015 45
1873.....	44,318,469 60
		Total reduction.....	786,439,681 85

This served its purpose. The people grew stronger and more hopeful, the holders of American securities more confident, and the legal-tender notes gradually appreciated. They were worth in July, 1864, thirty-eight cents on a dollar; in July, 1866, sixty-six cents; in July, 1867, seventy-one cents; in July, 1869, seventy-three cents; in July, 1870, eighty-five cents. But the enemy during all this time was sowing tares; his sappers and miners were continuously at work to destroy the credit of the United States. Of course this was not their avowed purpose, but it was the inevitable tendency of their operations. They were undoubtedly inspired by a blind determination to overthrow the republican party, and, Samson-like, seemed to ignore the fact that the means adopted would topple over this magnificent temple, burying them beneath its ruins.

In the early days of the war the democratic party began to appeal to prejudice and ignorance and arouse hostility to the United States securities because they were not taxed. Attempt after attempt was made to impose a tax upon them. The Constitution, as expounded by Chief-Justice Marshall in 1819, (see McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland), clearly "left no power to the States, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operations of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into effect the powers vested in the National Government," and there had been since an unbroken line of decisions to the same end. But to save the public credit harmless against these attacks the republican Congress was obliged to reaffirm in statutes this constitutional exemption. It did so twice in 1862, again in 1863, twice in 1864, twice in 1865, again in 1870. And section 3701 of the Revised Statutes—"all stocks, bonds, Treasury notes, and other obligations of the United States shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal or local authority"—is a monument to the folly of the opposition and to the determined purpose of the republican party to strengthen the credit of their country. The right on the part of States and municipalities to tax the national obligations would enable them to cripple the Government in time of war; might make power weakness, turn victory to defeat. No nation can allow it, and no patriotic citizen ought to desire it.

From 1867 onward there was a vigorous warfare waged against the gold character of the bonds, principal and interest. Again a republican Congress came to the rescue of our imperiled credit, and in March, 1869, to strengthen and establish it, enacted into law these provisions, now contained in section 3693 of the Revised Statutes:

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. * * * The faith of the United States is also solemnly pledged to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

From that day the assaults upon this statute, in Congress and out, by democrats, greenbackers, nationalists, and fusionists, have been constant, but the law still stands as a witness to republican fidelity to principle. The nation was receiving the benefit of this fidelity in an improved credit, so that its legal-tender notes in July, 1870, were worth eighty-nine cents; and, relying upon this improved credit, a republican Congress, July 14, 1870, and January, 1871, passed the acts for the refunding of the bonded debt at a lower rate of interest, known as "the funding acts," under which the 5 per cent. bonds coming due next year were issued; also authorizing the issue of two hundred million 4½ per cent. bonds, redeemable after fifteen years, and seven hundred millions of 4 per cent. bonds, redeemable after thirty years. It was further provided that these bonds should not be sold for less than par in coin.

The transactions under these acts I will come to before I close. From this time to 1875 the legal-tender notes were fluctuating between eighty-two and ninety-two, and a republican Congress determined that good faith required their payment; therefore, January 14, 1875, they passed and the President approved "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments."

SEC. 3. * * * And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50.

From that day, to January, 1879, this law has been the point of attack. Every conceivable combination has been formed against it; new parties sprang into existence whose only platforms were opposition to it; State campaigns have been run with this the only issue and it entered largely into the last presidential contest. It has been discussed in Congress without limit, in State Legislatures, in town-houses, in school districts, all over the country. It was boldly declared that it would bring swift ruin upon the country; that the "bloated bloodhounds of Wall street" would make a run upon the Treasury and, in the twinkling of an eye, deplete it of its hoarded gold, bringing bankruptcy upon the nation; that our refunding operations would be paralyzed, and our credit destroyed.

It has been fiercely denounced as "the robber resumption act," "the thief from the poor," "the iron heel of despotic power." It has been charged that it was enacted at the demand of the rich, in their interests, to make them richer, the poor man poorer. In these Halls and from every platform in the land it had been proclaimed that "it would stop the wheels of business," "it would close every forge and put out every furnace fire," "it would seal up every open-mouthed mine," "would stop every revolving mill-wheel," "would make every honest toiler a tramp." So fierce and noisy was the cry that it frightened the whole democratic party into the "soft-money" ranks, made the venerable "bullionists" forget gold, their idol for fifty years, and turn devoutly to the worship of paper gods, made the knees of timid republicans tremble and shake like Belshazzar's at the feast. Scores of bills for the repeal or modification of this law have been introduced into Congress, and car-loads of speeches denouncing it have been made, printed, and scattered over the country. Once an act for its repeal passed the House. Amid all the din, the confusion, the babel of tongues, the noise and war of democrats, greenbackers, nationalists, communists, and demagogues, the main body of the republican party stood by their guns, and on January 1, 1879, the resumption provided for by law, became resumption in fact, as silently as the stars move in their orbits.

Where is the national bankruptcy, the run upon the Treasury, the depletion of its gold, and what now of the paralysis which was to strike refunding? The records of the Treasury Department show that the amount of coin paid out in redemption of legal-tender notes from January 1, 1879, to December 31, 1879, is $11,456,536; but during the same period legal-tenders were received in payment of customs dues to the amount of $109,467,456. It may also be stated that during the same period the Treasury paid out on account of coin obligations more than $250,000,000 in legal-tender notes. This has been done by consent, not by law, because resumption made the greenback as good as gold, while in form it was more convenient for use. There are millions more of gold in the Treasury now than there were on the day of resumption, and there is to-day before the Committee of Ways and Means a bill requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to devote a part of it to the purchase of bonds.

As to the influence of resumption upon refunding, the information from the Treasury Department shows that it was most beneficial. During the eight years previous to resumption the Government had been able to sell for refunding purposes only $500,000,000 of five percents, $185,000,000 of four and one-half percents, and about $175,000,000 four percents. Then came specie payments, and in the three and a half months following January 1, 1879, there were sold $540,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds and certificates.

Where is the widespread ruin? Where are the silent forges, the fireless furnaces, the motionless mill-wheels, the honest toilers turned to tramps?

Why, the whole aspect of the country was changed by resumption. Confidence was restored, timid capital recovered its courage, depressed business became active and elated, sluggish discontent gave way to buoyant happiness, adversity yielded to prosperity, the silent forges became noisy, the fireless furnaces were lighted, turning the darkness of night into the light of day, and the honest tramps became busy toilers. There are those so blind they will not see, but the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err in the signs of the times. The stock lists, the bond quotations, the dividends declared, the new enterprises started, are sure indications of a renewed life and activity. In my own city of 20,000 inhabitants the manufacturing stocks alone have increased in value, since January, 1879, nearly $3,000,000. Iron has doubled in value, and steel rails have gone from $45 a ton to $85, and yet the railroad companies have ordered over a million of tons the last year. From 1868 to 1873 the average annual area of wheat in this country was in round numbers twenty million acres; last year, thirty-three millions; of corn, from 1868 to 1873, thirty-four millions; last year, fifty-two millions; and the increase in oats, rye, and barley equally great. From 1868 to 1873 the balance of trade against us was two hundred and seventy-eight and a half millions, while last year the balance in our favor was $269,333,000. From a reliable paper I quote the following table, as a comparison of a few articles of export of 1873 with that of 1879:

Articles.	1873.	1879.	Gain.
Breadstuffs	$69,024,059	$210,255,528	$141,331,469
Provisions	30,436,642	116,858,650	86,422,008

Refined sugar.....	1,142,824	6,164,024	5,021,208
Total			242,496,589

In 1868 we were doing business on an irredeemable currency, and were therefore unable to compete with foreign manufacturers. Let us compare the export of a very few manufactured articles of 1868 with the exports of 1879, as follows:

Articles.	1868.	1879.	Gain.
Agricultural implements.....	$673,381	$2,933,388	$2,260,007
Copper and brass, manufactured	496,369	3,031,924	2,535,555
Cotton, manufactured.....	4,871,054	10,853,950	5,982,896
Iron and steel, manufactured.....	5,491,306	12,766,294	7,274,988
Leather, copper, and lead, manufactured.....	607,105	6,800,070	6,192,964

Tallow	2,540,227	6,934,940	4,394,713
Total			44,915,718

The railroads tell the same story, and the exchanges repeat it. I quote from the New York Tribune of March 1:

Railroads continue to report very satisfactory gains in gross earnings. Among the largest proportionate gains reported since January 1 are $198,000, or 140 per cent., on the Saint Louis and San Francisco; $276,000, or 82 per cent., on the Missouri, Kansas and Texas; $95,000, or 60 per cent., on the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern; $301,000, or 58 per cent., on the Iron Mountain; $252,000, or 50 per cent., on the Chicago and Alton; $186,000, or 38 per cent., on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé; $355,000 on the Milwaukee and Saint Paul; $359,000 on the Philadelphia and Reading; and $246,000 on the Louisville and Nashville, each 37 per cent., and $306,000, or 35 per cent., on the Wabash Pacific.

The exchanges at New York for the month of February, 1880, were larger by 55 per cent. than in February, 1879, and the increase in amount of stock transactions has been smaller than the increase in other exchanges. At Boston, during three weeks of February, the exchanges amounted to $212,000,000, against $140,000,000 in 1879, a gain of 52 per cent.; at Philadelphia, for the same period, the gain was 63 per cent.; at Chicago, 51 per cent.; at Milwaukee, 55 per cent.; at Pittsburgh, 68 per cent.; at Saint Louis, 43 per cent.; at Baltimore, 26 per cent.; and at New Orleans, 25 per cent. At other minor places the increase in transactions was also large.

But, Mr. Speaker, why need I say more in this direction? Prosperity has surely come, and, if we are wise, has come to stay.

I recur now to the refunding act of July, 1870, and call the attention of the House to the operations under it as further evidence of the wisdom of the republican Congress in strengthening the public credit. No action was taken under this law until March, 1871, when Secretary Boutwell invited subscriptions. Before the 1st of August he sold for coin at par or exchanged for outstanding six percents about $75,000,000 of the five percents authorized by the refunding act. He then made arrangements with associated bankers by which he sold during the remainder of his term of office $125,000,000, making, in all, $200,000,000 sold by him.

Secretary Richardson continued substantially the arrangement made by his predecessor, and sold, in round numbers, $120,000,000 of the same kind of bonds. Secretary Bristow succeeded Mr. Richardson, and sold the balance of the five percents authorized, being, in round numbers, $180,000,000. Secretary Morrill succeeded Mr. Bristow, and made a contract for the sale of the $300,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds authorized by the refunding act, under which he sold during his term of office $90,000,000. Under this same contract Secretary Sherman, who succeeded Mr. Morrill, sold $95,000,000 of the same bonds. In all these transactions up to this point the ½ of 1 per cent. provided by law for the payment of expenses in refunding was used in paying commissions and other expenses appertaining to the issue of the bonds. Secretary Sherman also sold of 4 per cent. bonds for refunding $710,345,950; but of the ½ of 1 per cent. allowed for expenses and commissions there still remains unexpended about $1,100,000.

It may be further stated that in some of the transactions interest was paid for a period not exceeding three months both on the bonds issued and the bonds redeemed. No exact amount of the so-called "double interest" paid can be stated, but the Department is satisfied that it does not exceed ¼ of 1 per cent. on the amount of bonds refunded. None was paid on the first $75,000,000 sold by Secretary Boutwell, nor on the amount sold by Secretary Bristow, and on the four percents sold by Mr. Sherman a premium of ¼ of 1 per cent. was secured on $150,000,000, thus compensating in part for the extra interest paid. During all the negotiations, whenever calls were made in advance of subscriptions a corresponding saving was effected in the amount of interest thus paid, and these calls were made to the extent sometimes of thirty or forty million dollars.

The expenses incurred in refunding since 1870 may therefore be stated as follows:

Amount of bonds issued.....	$1,395,345,950 00
Appropriation authorized of ½ of 1 per cent.....	$6,976,729 75
Balance unexpended.....	1,100,000 00
Amount expended.....	5,876,729 75
Add a liberal estimate of amount of extra interest paid	10,000,000 00
Total.....	15,876,729 75

Or, say, in round numbers $16,000,000, which I am confident will more than cover every expense involved in the refunding transactions. The total saving in interest on account of refunding the debt from 1871 to June 30, 1880, will be $52,139,560.50. The saving in interest by reason of reductions of the principal of the public debt between August 31, 1865, and June 30, 1879, is $527,486,549.18, making a total saving by reduction and refunding, not including the large reductions by purchases made during the fiscal year 1880, of $579,626,109.68. The present annual saving in interest by refunding is $19,900,846.50.

After this refunding, February 1, 1880, the debt of the United States was as follows:

4 per cent. bonds, including certificates.....	$740,845,950 00
4½ per cent. bonds.....	250,000,000 00
5 per cent. bonds.....	506,495,350 00
6 per cent. bonds.....	270,345,550 00
3 per cent. Navy pension fund.....	14,000,000 00
Total.....	1,781,686,850 00

Brought forward	$1,781,686,850 00
Debt not bearing interest	394,510,095 96
Debt on which interest has ceased	12,002,445 26
Interest due and unpaid	3,330,628 65
Interest accrued	12,996,489 62
	2,204,526,509 49
Deduct cash on hand	203,742,268 57

Net debt 2,000,784,240 92
 The annual interest being less than $83,000,000, in place of the annual interest of 1865 of $150,977,697.

The 6 per cent. and the 5 per cent. bonds are all redeemable at the option of the Government during this and next year, amounting to a little more than $776,000,000. To redeem these, the Committee of Ways and Means have reported the bill under consideration and have expressed the opinion that it can be easily accomplished. I certainly hope they may be right. If they are, the annual interest will be reduced to a little over $65,000,000.

What a magnificent financial achievement! When has it been paralleled in the world?

A bond bearing a lower rate of interest than 4 per cent. has never been sold at par in any country, yet our four percents are at a premium of 7 per cent. I call attention to the rates in England and France, as shown by these tables.

It will be seen that while the English consols are three percents, they always sold at a discount; that the debt of England in 1878 was a little over $3,800,000,000; "the annual interest and cost of management" were $142,063,756; so that the interest must have exceeded 3½ per cent.

But, Mr. Speaker, I should not do justice to the republican party if I should stop with this magnificent record. Its eye was not single to the reduction of the debt, to the strengthening of our credit, to the refunding at a lower rate of interest. It never forgot the people, nor was unmindful of the burdens they were bearing, and it commenced at the earliest possible moment the lightening of them, as will appear by this table:

There has also been a reduction in duties, as will appear in the following table:

In the matter of reduction of tariff duties it will be seen from table No. 2 that the rate of duty on all goods imported, free and dutiable, has decreased since the year 1868 from 44.687 per cent. to 28.975 per cent. Assuming that the same amount of goods had been imported with the rate of duties fixed at the rate existing in 1868, the total amount collected would have been $2,875,574,308.18, or $729,196,592.88 more than was actually collected.

From table No. 1 it will be seen that the total reduction in internal-revenue receipts arising from reduction of taxes to June 30, 1879, is $2,834,057,000; making a total reduction of customs and internal-revenue dues of more than $3,500,000,000. In other words, had there been no reduction of taxes, and other conditions remaining the same, the people would have paid this latter sum as taxes to the Government during the period in question in addition to what they have actually paid. This amount would be sufficient to wipe out the present public debt and leave a surplus of $1,500,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me summarize. The record shows that in 1860 the rate of interest for Government loans was 12 per cent.; that the amount required could not be obtained for that; that the republican party, in 1861, came into possession of a dismembered nation and a bankrupt Treasury; carried on to a successful issue a four years' war; expended more than $4,000,000,000; in 1865 found the restored Republic owing about $2,800,000,000, $400,000,000 of which were legal-tender notes, greatly depreciated, and still more to depreciate; legislated from time to time to strengthen the credit of the country; to the same end, for several years, paid that debt at the rate of one hundred millions a year, the whole amount paid to the present date being about $800,000,000; provided for refunding at a lower rate of interest and for the resumption of specie payments; refunded the whole debt refundable; resumed specie payments; so appreciated the legal-tender notes that they are at a premium; so strengthened the national credit that the bonds of the United States bearing 4 per cent. interest are at a premium of 7 per cent.; that the Committee of Ways and Means insist that the balance of the debt can be easily refunded at a rate of 3½ per cent.; reduced the annual interest on the debt from one hundred and fifty-one millions to about eighty-four; took every step in these directions, from the first day of the war to now, in the face of a determined opposition; never retraced a step, though the temptations to do so were almost overwhelming, though hard times, panics, and popular clamor lashed them fearfully in the face; at the same time reduced the burdens the people were bearing by repealing in revenue taxes alone from July, 1866, to July, 1872, over $262,000,000, saving the people to the present time from the payment of nearly $3,000,000,000.

This is the glorious financial record of the republican party, and, sir, almost in the presence of the history itself, I dare declare that no party, no nation in the whole wide world, from the day of its creation to now, can show its parallel, and yet the gentleman from New York says, "The management of the public debt since 1865 has not been the best that could have been devised. There has not been a stable policy founded on principles of enlightened statesmanship."

"The figures given in the following table, relative to the loans of 1793-1817, inclusive, are based upon information derived from a somewhat similar table originally published in McCulloch's Treatise on Taxes and the Funding System, London, 1852, and republished in the appendix to an essay of William Newmarch, on the Loans raised by

Mr. Pitt, which essay appeared in the London Statistical Journal for September, 1855. The figures relating to the loans of 1847-1856 are derived from Sir Stafford Northcote's Twenty Years of Financial Policy, pages 94, 265, 278, 288."

In 1793 the total funded and floating debt of Great Britain was $1,239,372,170, the interest on which, at the several rates of 3, 3½, 4, and 5 per cent., amounted annually to $48,556,190. In 1817 the total debt, including exchequer bills, had reached the sum of $4,196,910,725, carrying an annual interest of $157,959,635. In 1857 the amount of the funded debt, exchequer bills and exchequer bonds, was $4,040,543,610, the annual interest upon which was $142,750,195. The total debt had diminished in 1875 to $3,876,741,930, with an annual charge for interest and cost of management of $135,472,400; while in 1878 there appeared a slight increase, the amount of the debt being then $3,888,907,980, with interest and cost of management equaling $142,063,756.

The following table in reference to the French loans of 1870-71-72 has been compiled from data given in the May, 1877, number of the Bulletin de Statistique et de Legislation Comparée:

The consolidated debt of France on January 1, 1879, amounted to $3,972,407,312.44, and was bonded as follows:

5 per cent. bonds.....	$1,383,494,048 00
4½ per cent. bonds.....	166,412,351 11
4 per cent. bonds.....	2,330,480 00
3 per cent. bonds.....	2,420,270,433 33
Total.....	3,972,407,312 44

None of these bonds sold at par, and some of the three percents sold as low as sixty cents on the dollar.

Mr. WARNER. Before my friend takes his seat I would like to ask one question, which he can answer by "yes" or "no." Is he not in favor of executing faithfully the sinking-fund law?

Mr. FRYE. If we can pay the debt faster than that, I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. WARNER. Is not the sinking-fund law an obligation of the Government?

Mr. FRYE. It is an obligation of the Government which I recognize as binding. But if the Government can go further and pay nearly 50 per cent. more annually than the sinking fund calls for, I think by so doing that fund will be fully and completely met in spirit.

Mr. WARNER. But does not the gentleman know that if the sinking fund is executed the matured debt would all be paid within thirteen years?

Mr. FRYE. I have already trespassed upon the time belonging to another gentleman, and must do so no further.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, whatever difference of opinion there may be respecting the measures of financial policy contemplated by the bill under consideration, all will agree that their importance is such as to demand our first and most serious consideration.

In any condition of the Government financial legislation in its nature is of vital importance. Money is the life-blood of civilization, and its equal and uniform circulation is as essential to equity and prosperity as that of the natural blood to health and enjoyment of life. It pervades every governmental function and permeates the entire body-politic. Whatever affects it reaches every condition and interest in society.

On the 1st day of February, 1880, our national indebtedness aggregated $2,188,191,000, a sum quite equal to one-sixth of the entire stock of gold and silver in the world.

To provide for the payment of this immense debt consistently with the national faith, and yet distribute its burdens equitably and so as to have them rest as lightly as possible upon the productive industries of the country, is the paramount problem in American politics. In our endeavors to solve it in the interest of the whole people we cannot guard too well against empiricism on the one hand and temporizing conservatism on the other, and yet bring to the subject that courageous surrender of the mind which the gravity of the duty demands. Fortunately for the country the questions involved in the proposed legislation received appropriate consideration and treatment by the Forty-fourth Congress, as will be seen by reference to the Report of the Silver Commission, volume 1, page 1:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 2, 1877.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the monetary commission created under the joint resolution of August 15, 1876, submitted the following report:

The commission created under the joint resolution of August 15, 1876, submit the following report:

The resolution creating the commission and defining its duties was as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the Senate; three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; and experts, not exceeding three in number, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, and to take evidence, and whose duty it shall be to inquire—

"First, Into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver; the causes thereof, whether permanent or otherwise; the effects thereof upon trade, commerce, finance, and the productive interests of the country, and upon the standard (of) value in this and foreign countries;

"Second, Into the policy of the restoration of the double standard in this country; and, if restored, what the legal relation between the two coins, silver and gold, should be;

"Third, Into the policy of continuing legal-tender notes concurrently with metallic standards, and the effects thereof upon the labor, industries, and wealth of the country; and

"Fourth, Into the best means for providing for facilitating the resumption of specie payments."

The commission as organized consisted of Messrs. John P. Jones, Lewis V. Bogy, and George S. Boutwell, of the Senate; Messrs. Randall L. Gibson, George Willard, and Richard P. Bland, of the House of Representatives; Hon. William S. Groesbeck, of Ohio, and Professor Francis Bowen, of Massachusetts. George M. Weston, of Maine, was appointed secretary.

The sessions of the commission were held in the city of New York until the assembling of Congress in December last. They have since been held in the city of Washington.

Immediately after the creation of the commission circulars were issued to bankers, publicists, and commercial men in this country, and to eminent financial authorities in Europe, and (through the State Department) to the representatives of the United States in foreign countries. These circulars contained interrogatories which were intended to elicit the widest possible information upon all topics covered by the resolution of August 15, 1876. The chambers of commerce in the leading cities in this country were invited to furnish, and did furnish, lists of the persons most likely to be able to give information.

A large number of persons appeared before the commission, who were orally examined. In addition numerous written papers from various sections of this country were received in answer to the circulars of the commission. These papers, as well as the oral testimony taken down by stenographers, are reported herewith.

Our ministers abroad have exhibited a patriotic and intelligent zeal in collecting official and other information in the countries to which they are accredited. The documents which they have furnished are very valuable, and some of them not attainable except through official applications. Some of our ministers have added able and interesting original papers. All these documents and contributions are herewith submitted.

The commission are much indebted to the Secretary of State for his prompt and courteous co-operation in facilitating their communication through his Department with our ministers abroad. They are also indebted to the Bureau of Statistics, which promptly and courteously furnished all the information asked for.

Several gentlemen in Europe, eminent as financial authorities, have addressed communications to the commission, which are among the submitted papers. One of these gentlemen, M. Cernuschi, appeared personally before the commission and furnished important and valuable information, which will be found in the reported testimony. The thanks of the country are due to him and to the other distinguished citizens of foreign nations who have made these disinterested efforts in the elucidation of a question important to the welfare of mankind.

It thus appears that the commission in purpose and work embraced finance in its widest range. And surely the thanks of the country and of mankind are due the commissioners for the very able, exhaustive, and disinterested investigation and elucidation of the questions covered by the resolution creating the commission. And certainly the information obtained and the conclusions reached could not be more strongly commended to the consideration and acceptance of their countrymen.

Germany and the United States demonetized silver in 1873. * * * Manifestly, the real reason for the demonetization of silver was the apprehension of the creditor classes that the combined production of the two metals would raise prices and cheapen money unless one of them was shorn of the money function. In Europe this reason was distinctly avowed.—Report of Monetary Commission, page 4, volume 1.

Such is the language of the commission. It is bold, direct, and unequivocal. The information furnished is of the most important character. It establishes two propositions:

First. Demand and supply, the exclusive factors of value, govern money value. And hence, whatever diminishes supply or prevents its increase benefits the creditor classes and money-holders by raising the purchasing power of money and augmenting the value of credits. On the contrary, whatever diminishes demand or increases supply benefits the debtor and wealth-producing classes by raising prices and diminishing the value of credits. Classes naturally take sides in accordance with their interests.

Secondly. The dangerous influence which the creditor classes and money-holders exercise upon financial legislation.

To these forces the commission refers the origin and success of the scheme of demonetization soon after the discovery of gold in California and Australia.

At that time gold promising the more abundant yield was selected for demonetization. The creditor classes and those having fixed incomes boldly demanded it in order, as they frankly avowed, to protect themselves against the anticipated rise in general prices. Under their appeals several nations in Europe, notably Germany and Austria, in 1857 demonetized gold. It is probable that the movement in that direction would have become universal in Europe but for the resistance of France. It was changed, at least as early as 1865, into a movement for the demonetization of silver. * * * But this change from demonetizing gold to demonetizing silver was more of form than of substance. The object aimed at by both was through a disuse of one of the money metals to protect the creditor classes and those having fixed incomes against a fall in the value of money and a rise in general prices. This is the pith and marrow of the monetary discussions of the last twenty-five years.—Report of Monetary Commission, page 15, volume 1.

Yes, and it is the pith and marrow of the money question of to-day. The same motives and interests actuate creditors in demanding the demonetization and abandonment of paper money as influenced them in demanding the demonetization of gold or silver, one or the other, as fluctuating supply affected their interests. The cause is clear, the reason plain. Whatever diminishes the demand for money by supplying its uses and taking its place checks its rise and diminishes its value.

In the language of the commission:

It is the limitation of the quantity of money, without any reference to the cost of its production, that regulates the value of each unit of money, whether fiat or metallic. In the case of fiat money, the limitation is imposed by law. In the case of metallic money, it is imposed by nature. The effect of limitation upon the value of money is precisely the same in both instances. In the one case the limitation is regulated by the wisdom and justice of man; in the other, it is regulated by the variable and uncertain obstacles which nature opposes to the production of the metals. The value of money, of whatever kind, is measured by the cost of obtaining it after it has been produced, and not by the cost of its production, and this value is indicated by the general range of prices.—Report of Monetary Commission, volume 1, page 35.

The hard-money theory that nothing but gold and silver can be money photographs a dismal future for mankind.

The gold yield of Australia and California was at its maximum in the five years ending with 1856. The aggregate production of both metals was also at its maximum during the same period. Since then the combined annual production of the two metals, instead of augmenting, has diminished.—Ibid., volume 1, page 14.

It is true that new sources of supply may be discovered, but it is improbable that new sources equally prolific will ever be discovered, and it is only barely possible that they will be discovered and made available within any near period. It has been said that, "unlike agriculture, there is but one crop in a mine;" and it may also be said that the greater the number of mines and gold-fields worked out, the less chances there are of finding new ones.—Ibid., page 15.

An increasing value of money and falling prices have been and are more fruitful of human misery than war, pestilence, or famine. They have wrought more injustice than all the bad laws which were ever enacted.—Ibid., page 10.

If metallic money becomes insufficient, by reason of demonetization of either of the precious metals, or from any cause, one of two things must happen:

The commercial, industrial, and numerical progress of mankind must be arrested, and if the decrease of money shall be a continuing one and cover a long period of time it must end in an absolute check to progress and possibly the destruction of existing social and political institutions. Or, what is most probable, relief would be sought in an extension and perpetuation of existing systems of inconvertible money, which owe their origin to the pressure of expanding population and commerce against the restrictive bounds of a stationary and perhaps declining aggregate supply of the two metals.

A shrinkage of money and falling prices always have had and always must have a tendency to concentrate wealth, to enrich the few and to impoverish and degrade the many. This tendency is subtle, active, and portentous throughout the world to-day.—Ibid., pages 24, 25.

The alternative thus presented is

INCONVERTIBLE PAPER MONEY.

It is the horn of the dilemma to which the logic of events has brought us, and on which hang not only the existing social and political institutions of our country, but the hopes of freedom and equality throughout the world. Thanks to the commission for the issue so sharply, so plainly defined; and since there is no other escape from the inexorable logic of demand and supply, surely the philanthropist and patriot will not hesitate to explore the alternative in all phases and bearings.

This is what the commission did, and after the most thorough, philosophic, and exhaustive investigations, reached the conclusions expressed in the following passages of the report, volume 1, page 9:

There can never be practically two money standards whose units of account differ in value in any country at the same time. It is all-important that the value of the standard should be unchanging. It is not important that the material which represents the value should be unchanging. It is of little consequence of what the material consists, if it be portable, divisible, and indestructible, or, if destructible, that it can be replaced with facility. There should never be any hesitation in changing the material of money for the purpose of maintaining its value undisturbed.

This passage embraces two fundamental and vital propositions:

First. There cannot be two money standards differing in value; in other words, if there be two differing in uses, or the one based on the other, the superior absorbs and controls the inferior, and by its own volume exclusively regulates value, and hence bank-notes and Treasury notes not full tender do not affect the value of money. They produce contractions and expansions at the bidding of the superior, but in their subservience to their superior, are always guarded against any diminution of this power. Upon this point I repeat the language of the commission, volume 1, pages 6 and 7:

The two metals together fill but scantily the measure of the money needs of the world, and they can only fill it upon the condition that both are money in the fullest sense; and nothing is such money if it be restricted in its legal-tender function.

Prices, notwithstanding the use of banking expedients and credits, governed by the volume of money.

On pages 36, 37, 38, and 39 this subject is elaborated by the commission. Volume 1, page 36:

It is sometimes maintained that a compensation can be made for a shrinkage in the volume of money by an increase of such banking expedients as checks, bills of exchange, and clearing-houses. These expedients are now resorted to, and, because profit is found in their use, always will be availed of to the utmost possible extent. It is manifest, therefore, that, whatever the proportion or percentage they bear to the volume of money, it cannot be increased except through an increase in that volume. And it is as manifest that, when the volume of money is diminished, these expedients must diminish, and prices must fall in a corresponding ratio. Money is the primary and governing force, whose functions cannot be suspended by any device whatever, and whose volume or existence does not depend on banking expedients, while these expedients grow out of money and could not exist without it.

This proposition is so plain and so universally attested by experience that it is deemed unnecessary to add further in its demonstration. Its importance, however, cannot be overrated. It accounts for the partiality of the creditor classes and those controlling money for bank and Treasury notes without the legal tender, and their abhorrence for fiat or full legal-tender paper money. Secure behind the "obstacles which nature opposes to the production of the mines," if they can only maintain the metallic basis, decreasing volume assures their triumph and rule.

EFFECTS OF A DECREASING VOLUME OF MONEY.

While the volume of money is decreasing, even although very slowly, the value of each unit of money is increasing in corresponding ratio, and property is falling in price.—Report of Monetary Commission, volume 1, page 53.

It is estimated by the commission, as a consequence of increase of demand in excess of supply, that from 1809 to 1848 money increased in value 145 per cent. Volume 1, page 55:

A loan of money made in 1809, if repaid in 1848, would have been repaid with an addition of 145 per cent. in the purchasing power of principal and interest, besides all the interest paid. Those who have loaned money to this Government since 1861 have already received nearly as much in the increased value of their principal as in interest, and all the probabilities are, in respect to the 4 per cent. thirty-year national bonds now being negotiated, if they are redeemed in gold, that more profit will be made by the augmentation in the value of principal than through interest. Indeed, the signs of the times are that the bonds of a country possessing the unbounded resources and stable institutions of the United States, payable in gold at the end of thirty years without any interest whatever, would, through the increase of the value of that metal, prove a most profitable investment. * * * A shrinking volume of money transfers existing property unjustly, and causes a concentration and diminution of wealth.

The second proposition embraced in the passage quoted from page 9 is so fundamental and pivotal and so vehemently decried and furiously denounced as humbuggery by the creditor classes as to deserve special consideration.

"We are apt to believe what we most desire to believe." The creditor classes will naturally seek to persuade themselves and convince others that the proposition is fallacious, for if its truth be established they will be stripped of pretense and forced to avow the real motive of their opposition to paper money, or else yield to the cause of justice and humanity. The proposition assumes that the money material is not of itself money, but becomes such only when indued by law with the functions of money. It discards the theory that money is wealth. It accepts as true the views of the inconvertible-paper or fiat-money school, which are very fairly stated by the commission:

The views of this school are that utility, accompanied by limitation of quantity, is the basis of exchangeable value. That this utility may either depend upon such intrinsic qualities as would render the thing possessing them valuable to man in isolation as well as to man in society, or upon such intrinsic, artificial qualities which society may confer upon any article, however intrinsically valueless, by endowing it with the power of performing the money function. That the evident fact that this function does not inhere in and cannot be conferred on any article so as to make it either valuable or useful to man in isolation, while it is essential to the very existence of society demonstrates that money value is not derived from the useful, intrinsic qualities of the material upon which the money function may be conferred. They also call attention to the facts that the usefulness to the individual of any article depends solely upon the intrinsic qualities which it may possess, and is not at all diminished by its existence in unlimited quantity, but that money, on the contrary, becomes entirely useless unless its quantity be limited. They conclude from these facts that the money value of the material of which money is composed rests solely upon the purely artificial and extrinsic qualities conferred upon it; that this value is inseparable from society, and grows out of its need of and demand for an instrument of valuation and exchange.

They maintain that money is not in itself wealth, but a set of counters for computing and exchanging wealth, or, as was said by Bishop Berkeley, "A ticket entitling to power and fitted to record and transfer this power;" and that "it is of little consequence what materials the tickets are made of."—Report of Monetary Commission, volume 1, pages 40, 41.

Such are the views of the greenback party. The argument may be reduced to a syllogism: Things equal in uses are equal in value. Articles endowed with equal money functions are equal in monetary uses. Therefore, paper and metal of equal legal tender are equal in monetary value.

Mr. Justice Strong, of the Supreme Court, delivering the opinion of the court in the legal-tender cases, (12 Wallace, page 543,) uses the following language:

Making the notes legal-tenders gave them a new use, and it needs no argument to show that the value of things is in proportion to the uses to which they may be applied.

The views of the metallic school are stated by the commission with equal fairness.

The especial merits claimed for this system are, that its workings are entirely automatic, that the money value of the commodities upon which it is based depends upon their useful intrinsic qualities and is measured by the average cost of their production, and that their volume depends upon the yield of mines, and not upon the caprice of legislation. They claim that the province of the Government is not to create money, but to coin it, and thereby give to it the best authentication of purity and weight.—Report of Monetary Commission, volume 1, page 39.

This theory rests upon two fundamental propositions:

First. Money is of itself wealth; and Second. That it is limited to the wealth of the mines.

These propositions, if true, involve the gravest considerations.

It needs no argument to show that society cannot exist without money, and it is equally plain that those who own and control money govern society; so that those who own and control the mines hold the key to the power that rules all nations, and are themselves virtually the masters of mankind. This cold-blooded theory assumes that nature denies the creative power to man, as something above his capabilities, especially those of the masses of mankind, but has indued gold and silver with this divine creative attribute, and hid them in the recesses of the earth, to enrich and ennoble the lucky finder, and to give him power and dominion over the earth and all things therein. This doctrine is doubtless pleasing to those who have gold and silver, and whose credits and incomes entitle them to gold and silver. It subjects labor and wealth in all other forms to their pleasure, not to say caprice. It teaches that the natural tendency of civilization is to a moneyed aristocracy, the perfection of political science. This may be delightful to those who expect to be of the aristocracy, but appalling, indeed, to those whom it condemns to drudgery, penury, and want. After careful investigation and thorough examination of the arguments in support of this theory, the commission reached the conclusion stated on page 29, volume 1:

The demand for the precious metals as commodities is believed by many to be still essential to their general and ready acceptance as money. If this is true, it is a misfortune. The happiness and prosperity of the world, if not wholly dependent upon, are largely influenced by, the steadiness of the value of money, which cannot exist without steadiness in its volume. The demand for the precious metals as commodities is fitful and irregular, and always affects the volume of money in the most injurious direction—that of decreasing it. History shows that a deficiency of money is more probable and more to be feared than an excess, and this deficiency is caused in a great measure by the insidious and constant encroachments upon the precious metals of other demands for them than as money. When the magnitude of the world's interests and equities, which rests on steadiness in the value of money, is contrasted with the comparative unimportance of the uses of the metals as commodities, it becomes apparent that the subjection of the value of money to disturbance from the demands for gilded signs and looking-glasses, for bangles and breastpins, is an evil which the benefits derived from such uses but poorly compensate.

This argument to a fair and unprejudiced mind is overwhelming and conclusive; but to a mind obscured by prejudice or biased by interest it may be as "sounding brass and tinkling cymbal." "A man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still;" and it is felt that there is but little hope of reaching the head or heart of one who cannot or will not understand the difference between the tool and the uses served by it. It certainly requires no argument to show that the tools which serve equally the highest uses of which either is capable are always equal in value, the lesser uses being merged in the greater. Who would contend that a horse is unserviceable for the plow because not suitable for the turf? Who could think that the woodman's ax is unserviceable and valueless because the metal of which it is composed is not capable of being used as a surgeon's knife? But, driven from the field of argument, the votaries and myrmidons of Mammon arrogate to themselves the prerogative of defending the views and purposes of their opponents. They are always sure to make them so extravagant as to render them ridiculous. They proclaim aloud that fiat money has no basis, and is therefore valueless; whereas, like gold and silver coin, it rests on the obligation of the Government to receive it in payment of all public dues and the fiat of the Government making it a legal tender in payment of private debts, without which gold and silver would cease to be money.

The basis is broad indeed, covering the present and prospective wealth (including gold and silver) of the people of the United States. It is the credit of the Government, co-extensive with the demand of the Government upon the people for support, and with the people's need for a medium of exchange. It anticipates the revenues of the Government, and, like bonds, is bottomed on taxes. In the case of bonds the Government collects the taxes and pays the creditor. In case of fiat money the holder collects the taxes and pays himself. The bonds bear interest. Fiat money by its serviceableness as a medium of exchange supports itself, thus relieving the people of the taxes necessary to carry the bonds, and at the same time furnishes them a circulating medium equal to gold and equally serviceable as a medium of exchange, and thereby saving to the people the wealth which they would otherwise have to give for a medium of exchange. Experience attests what reason demonstrates. The first $60,000,000 issued by the Government during the war, and made of tender equal with coin, maintained par throughout the war. The act of May, 1878, modifying and virtually repealing the resumption act of 1875, fixes permanently in the volume of money $346,000,000 of our present greenback circulation.

In the language of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, [Mr. BUCKNER,] "it cannot be withdrawn, redeemed, or destroyed."

"THUS FAR GREENBACKS CONQUER."

From the 1st day of January, 1879, it became absolute money—that is, a legal tender in all payments; since which time it has commanded a slight premium over gold owing to its greater convenience, its uses being equal. Thus, by a single act of Congress, $346,000,000 of our national indebtedness was virtually extinguished and $346,000,000 of money equal to gold added to the wealth of the nation. Contraction was partially arrested, and as a legitimate consequence the country has experienced corresponding benefits.

During the year 1879, the Treasury received more than $40,000,000 of gold and silver in exchange for absolute fiat money; and yet it is trash, and those who advocate it lunatics!

The question here thrusts upon the mind, Why not profit by experience, yield to the demands of patriotism, monetize the credit of the people, and extinguish instead of refunding any part of the national indebtedness?

[Aside: The creditors will not let us; it would ruin our party.]

The pretense that it would be repudiation can avail nothing, for recent experience shows that the creditors will not only receive it, but greatly prefer it, even to coin—especially silver. Besides, if issued and placed in the Treasury, coin in exchange for it would accumulate much faster than it would be required to accommodate capricious creditors. Certainly the Government can enter the market and purchase the bonds, just as any bank in Europe or America might. Of this there can be no doubt. And such being undeniably the case, there cannot possibly arise any trouble between the bondholders and the Government. The bonds are in the market and being sold daily.

Sir, this pretense is too transparent to hide the mighty power that will scruple at no pretext and hesitate at nothing that will serve to obstruct or baffle any attempt to utilize the credit of the nation for the benefit of the whole people.

Why, sir, if the Government were to monetize its credit and pay off its indebtedness, the effect on credits and incomes would be much greater than if Australia and California were to open anew their mines and add two billions to the volume of gold and silver. Interest prompts the contest, and its magnitude gives gauge of the desperate struggle. It is not enough to overcome resistance; the motive for it must be extinguished.

But the creditor classes insist that Congress cannot constitutionally make anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of private debts. If this be true, what a powerful fortress for them! For if the power be annihilated, then the control of the money volume is in their own hands. This is indeed a momentous question, for without this power we can hardly be esteemed an independent nation.

It is one of the admitted advantages of our present system of irredeemable paper that it shelters us from the recurring demands for gold by the Bank of England. The London revolution of 1866, when one of the banking-houses (Overend & Gurney) went down with liabilities of $90,000,000, was scarcely felt here. With a currency of gold, or paper convertible into gold, we should feel instantly every change in Europe, and especially in England.—Report of Silver Commission, volume 1, page 115.

In the Hipburn-Griswold case, (8 Wallace, 615,) Chief-Justice Chase delivering the opinion of the court:

It is not doubted that the power to establish a standard of value by which all other values may be measured, or, in other words, to determine what shall be lawful money and make a legal-tender, is in its nature and of necessity a governmental power. It is in all countries exercised by the government. * * * Making the notes legal-tenders gave them a new use and it requires no argument to show that the value of things is in proportion to the uses to which they may be applied. (Supreme Court United States, 12 Wallace, p. 543; 12 Wallace, p. 567; Justice Bradley concurring.) I do not say that this is a war power, or that it is only to be called into exercise in times of war; for other public exigencies may arise in the history of a nation which may make it expedient and imperative to exercise it. But of the occasion when, and of the times how long, it shall be exercised and enforced, it is for the legislative department of the Government to judge. Feeling sensibly the judgments and wishes of the people, that department cannot long (if it is proper to suppose that within its sphere it ever came) misunderstand the business interests and just rights of the community. (Page 569.)

It would be sad, indeed, if this great nation were now to be deprived of a power so necessary to enable it to protect its own existence, and to cope with the other great powers of the world. No doubt foreign powers would rejoice if we should deny the power. No doubt foreign creditors would rejoice. They have from the first taken a deep interest in the question. But no true friend to our Government, to its stability and its power to sustain itself under all vicissitudes, can be indifferent to the great wrong which it would sustain by a denial of the power in question, a power to be seldom exercised, certainly; but one, the possession of which is so essential, and it seems to me, so undoubted.—Report of Silver Commission, volume 1, page 104.

The actual and legal money of the United States is now, and has been since 1862, paper issued by the Government. It owed its origin to exigencies growing out of civil war, and to the belief that it was necessary for the preservation of the Government. The law authorizing its issue has been decided by the highest judicial tribunal to be warranted by the Constitution. It owes its value to the demand of the population of the country for money, and not to the indefinite promise to redeem it in coin.—Ibid.

After a careful review of all the authorities the Secretary of the commission (Mr. Weston) sums up the conclusions reached on page 187, volume 1, as follows:

There must be admitted to be some hazards in making the concession which the precedent of the legal-tender paper of the civil war, and the decision of the Supreme Court thereupon compel to be made, that exigencies may arise when it will be "necessary and proper" for Congress, in order to execute its expressed powers, to force the currency of paper by law. Whatever the hazards may be, there is no escape from them. It is, however, true that the exigency which existed in the only case which has occurred of the exercise of this power, was real, and that the patriotic motives and high intelligence of those who determined that the necessity for it existed are unquestionable. For the future it will moderate if it does not wholly dispel alarms, to remember that sentiment of justice and of respect for private rights are nowhere so strong in this country as among the masses of the people, and that while they have often been the victims they have never been the perpetrators of frauds by means of monetary legislation. * * * If Congress can demonetize silver it can demonetize gold, or both gold and silver, and can monetize any substance or any form of paper. Narrowing money to gold is for the intended although really doubtful advantage of creditors.

No clamor was raised, no remonstrance was heard when Congress exercised this power in the interest of creditors by demonetizing silver, thereby decreasing the volume and increasing the value of money, but now when this same power is invoked to replenish, supply, and restore the equilibriums between the creditor classes and those having fixed incomes on the one hand, and the debtors and the wealth-producing classes on the other, unable to deny the authoritative force and conclusiveness of the decision of the Supreme Court, they have not hesitated to assail the Republic in its very vitals by traducing and denouncing the Supreme Court, charging that it was packed after the decision in the Hipburn-Griswold case (8 Wallace) so as to secure the final and conclusive decision rendered in the legal-tender case, (12 Wallace.) Notwithstanding the act of Congress providing for an additional member in the Supreme Court was passed more than six months before the decision in the first instance, and notwithstanding the further fact that Mr. Justice Grier, who concurred in that decision, resigned soon after it was rendered and thus created a vacancy, that was filled as in ordinary cases.

If the Supreme Court be not exempt a member of Congress cannot expect to escape vituperation and anathema, and the public must expect that no means will be spared to baffle, divide, evade, obscure, deceive, mislead, or divert the people. Every guise in partisanship will be assumed, every pretense worn, and every pretext plied.

The people will be told that money in itself is wealth, and therefore an equivalent in wealth for debt; and therefore it would not be just to compel creditors to receive paper money which of itself is valueless.

This intrinsic-value sophism was exploded by Dr. Franklin, in his reply to the English Board of Trade, in 1769. He said:

Gold and silver owe their value chiefly to the estimation in which they happen to be held among the generality of nations. That their intrinsic value was not so great as that of iron, a metal in itself capable of many more benefits to mankind. What makes three pence of silver pass for six? Even here in England it is indebted to the legal tender for a part of its value.

This is indeed very simple; yet many minds, because of custom, do not readily understand it.

A familiar example:

The market value of 412½ grains of silver is eighty-three cents; in money value one hundred cents. Whence comes the difference? Unquestionably it is the obligation of the Government which money implies—to receive it at one hundred cents in payment of dues. This obligation would be as potent to raise one grain of silver to one hundred cents. The value is derived not from the material, but from the money function which the Government confers upon it. It cannot be unjust to the creditor, because the Government is bound to make it good to him in the taxes and revenues of the Government. The Government to the extent of its liabilities is the creditor of the whole people; and surely no just-minded man will complain that he receive of his debtors what his creditors will receive of him. But obstinacy appeals to precedent, French assignats and confederate currency being shining lights; and yet how little worth. Analysis discovers the absence of credit, the substance of money.

Were this Government to pass a law making confederate money receivable in payment of all Government dues and a legal tender in all payments it would be at par with gold before the morrow's sunset. But "sophistry cleaves close to hide sin's rotten trunk." Conceding the existence of the authority in the Government and its potential capabilities, our opponents decry against its exercise, assuming that it is fraught with the greatest perils to society, because of the want of virtue and intelligence among the masses of the people. Its exercise in Russia, Germany, and England creates no distrust and excites no alarm, because these are monarchical and aristocratic governments, securely fortified against abuses of the power. We accept the issue. We assert that nowhere in the world are sentiments of justice and respect for private rights so strong as among the masses of the American people.

Sir, are we not the only example in ancient or in modern times of man's capability of conquering without enslaving his brother? Our Government rests on the virtue and intelligence of the people. Every element of disintegration has been eliminated. Pessimists may croak, fanatics rave, and ambition machinate, but the love and valor of the great masses of the people, whom it blesses and protects, will preserve and transmit it to succeeding generations. No government is as solid in its foundations or assured in its existence and perpetuation as ours. Our future is, indeed, auspicious. A wonderful destiny awaits us. Stretching from ocean to ocean, comprising two billion acres of land of unrivaled fertility, varied in climate and boundless in the elements of national wealth and power, our country is destined soon to occupy toward Europe the position of superiority now and so long held by her toward her mother country, Asia. We must needs have financial autonomy. Our increasing population and expanding commerce require the supply of money to be in equal step with demand. Our credit is equal to the requirement; shall we monetize it and meet the demand, or shall we longer continue subject to the demand for gold by the Bank of England, and leave our wealth-producing classes still a prey to foreign and domestic syndicates? The danger of abuse is chimerical. The creditor classes are benefited by increasing demand and diminishing supply. As already shown, credits (bonds) have increased in value 100 per cent. since 1861, thus doubling the wealth of the holders, besides the interest paid. It is estimated by the commission that future bonds will augment more in value than in interest. Therefore creditors will oppose any issue of money. Add to their forces the law-makers. The past certainly is not calculated to excite fears that Congressmen are apt to vote pay back. As money shrinks in volume their pay increases in value.

The influence may not be acknowledged, but it will be felt. Add the entire official corps, State and Federal, and we have an array of forces potent surely to resist supply. On the other hand, debtors will be interested in promoting supply and diminishing demand, whereby the weight of their debts will be diminished. Diminishing supply and increasing demand have often driven them to bankruptcy and ruin, but they have rarely impressed financial legislation. Such are the forces for and against. Between them we have the great body of the people holding the scales. Their only interest is in steadiness of volume, which cannot be maintained without equilibrium between demand and supply. How simple, how natural the equipoise; creditors and debtors acting and counteracting—the people, whose only motive is Equity, holding the scales.

Sir, the question recurs with emphasis, shall we monetize the national credit and extinguish the national indebtedness as the bonds fall due, relieving the people of taxes and furnishing them a circulating medium equal to gold? Or will we, turning our backs on those who sent us hither, and to whom we are indebted for honor and place, refund and perpetuate the national debt augmenting in value, and make our constituents beasts of burden to carry the baggage of European and American millionaires?

The issue is plain, the alternative unavoidable. Can we, dare we hesitate?

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Chairman, the American Congress is to-day considering the proposition whether our Government is now able to refund the public debt at an interest not exceeding 3½ per cent., and a large portion of our people maintain the affirmative of the proposition.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr.

WOOD, in addressing the House a short time since, affirmed his belief in our ability to refund at a lower rate, namely, 3 per cent., citing the example of England, who rarely paid over 3 per cent. interest, although she never made any considerable payment of the principal, and added, "It is evident that the United States has far greater resources to meet its obligations than Great Britain or any other nation."

The contrast between our national credit to-day with what it was in 1860, only twenty years ago, is one which should bring pride and joy to every patriotic heart. It is full of food for thought, rich in its lessons of experience, and eminently worthy the attention of the American people.

What does such contrast present? The democratic party in 1860 was in full possession of every department of the Government, and had been so for thirty years, with the exception of a brief interval. The nation was then in a state of profound peace, without any public debt worthy of the name, and with no demands upon the Treasury beyond the ordinary expenses of the Government. Congress in December of that year authorized a public loan, under which Treasury notes amounting to about $10,000,000 were negotiated at a discount which compelled the Government to pay a rate of interest ranging from 6 to 12 per cent. About four millions of this loan was negotiated at 10 per cent., and five millions of it at the extraordinary and ruinous rate of 12 per cent. To speak it plainly, so miserably and inefficiently were the affairs of the Government then managed that this great nation, with all its vast resources, was literally without credit and practically bankrupt.

How stands it with us to-day? Although an exhaustive and terrible war has intervened, calling daily for its millions to meet the public exigency and deranging almost every branch of productive industry, our national credit is higher than at any other period in our history. Our bonds are not only rapidly taken at 4 per cent. interest, but command a premium even at this low rate, while the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who, from his ability, his age, and his experience in public affairs, is justly regarded as the leader of his party in this House, assures us that our debt can readily be refunded at the low rate of 3½ per cent. interest. These remarkable facts fully attest the wisdom, the integrity, and ability with which the republican party has managed the financial affairs of the Government.

The result of this management is seen in the rapid reduction of the principal of our debt, which, on the 31st of August, 1865, amounted to the enormous sum of $2,845,907,626, but which, on the 1st of January, 1880, had been reduced to the sum of $2,011,798,504, a reduction without a parallel in the history of any nation, followed by an equally gratifying reduction in the rate of our interest.

While much has been accomplished much yet remains to be done. The money required for the extinction of so much of the debt as has already been paid has come from the labor of our people; the balance of our indebtedness must be extinguished in like manner. Our daily revenues are within a fraction of a million of dollars, and after meeting all the various obligations of the Government there remains to us an annual surplus of about $70,000,000, to be used from time to time in the payment of the remaining principal of the debt and in prosecuting such wise and practical measures as will result in the development of the country and affording such facilities to our people as will enhance the value of their labor. Such enhancement is equivalent to a practical reduction of taxes. Prominent among these facilities, within the ability as well as within the undoubted power and authority of the Government, is that of the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and, intimately connected therewith and as part of the system, the construction of lines of water communication between our rivers and lakes.

The question of cheap transportation, especially of our agricultural products, from the inland portions of the country to the seaboard is one which is now largely attracting the attention of our people and rapidly pressing for a practical solution.

The magnitude of the interests involved in this question affecting the present and future welfare of the millions of our citizens engaged in agricultural pursuits demand early and careful consideration on the part of the National Government, which alone has the authority and ability to provide adequate protection and encouragement for those interests.

Upon the prosperity of agriculture depends largely, if not entirely, the prosperity of other pursuits. Without markets for his surplus products, or without avenues to reach such markets the husbandman toils in vain. To provide these avenues is one of the plainest duties of the Government, because the very magnitude of the undertaking places it beyond the reach of private enterprise, or if left to private enterprise will result in combinations which completely regulate and control, at their own option, the price of products and reduce their value to a point which affords a bare subsistence beyond the actual cost of production.

Competition is not to be expected among individuals and corporations where combination always results to their advantage at the expense of the producer, who is unable to protect himself against "pools" and "rings" formed for the purpose of enriching themselves at his expense.

Transportation is either by railways or by water. When by the former, even if honestly and fairly managed, it exceeds the latter mode in cost not less than 20 or 25 per cent. This large percentage should be saved to the producer, and therefore, whenever transportation by water can be secured and made available, the duty of thus securing it is so self-evident as to admit of no argument.

The experience of the commercial world has long since demonstrated that transportation by water is not only the cheapest in itself, but that it also creates a competition which most effectively prevents the exorbitant charges to which so large a portion of the country is now inevitably subjected.

Take as an instance in illustration of this position the article of corn, so extensively produced in my State. The rates at this time established by the railroad companies for transporting it thence to "tidewater" is equal to twenty-five cents per bushel. The market price for "May corn" in New York is about fifty-four cents per bushel, so that the railroad companies are most magnanimously consenting to a pretty equal division with the farmer of the money realized from the sale of this important cereal, and thus putting into their coffers by means of these combinations nearly one-half of his year's labors for carrying his products to market.

This unjust condition of affairs results from the fact that no healthy competition exists, or ever will exist, under the present system of railroad monopoly, of "pooling freights," and of combinations which no sense of justice and fair dealing and no legislative enactment is strong enough to overcome or destroy.

This is an evil which ought not much longer be endured, a grievous wrong which should be remedied as speedily as possible. So far as regards a very large and important portion of our country, nature has pointed out and almost furnished an ample remedy for the removal of a large portion of this burden now borne by our people. I refer to the Mississippi River and its numerous tributaries, and to our chain of lakes, the former affording an outlet to the South, and the latter affording equally an outlet to the North. These great waterways need comparatively but small sums of money, judiciously and scientifically expended by the National Government, to give thousands of miles of cheap transportation for the products of the people inhabiting this most fertile part of the Republic.

This Congress has already initiated a project for the improvement of the Mississippi River commensurate with the vast interests involved and the almost incalculable benefits to result from its completion. This action of the Government must be followed by similar improvements of its most important tributaries; and also, wherever the same is practicable, by improvements which will connect the waters of the Mississippi with those of the lakes.

A proposition is now before the Committee on Railways and Canals for consideration, asking for an appropriation of money sufficient to test by actual survey the practicability of constructing a ship-canal or channel of water transportation between Toledo on the Lake and Lafayette on the Wabash River, one of the great tributaries of the Mississippi, and I feel a reasonable assurance that the proposition will receive favorable action on the part of the committee, and also of this House.

What, then, is fully comprehended in this proposition? The city of Fort Wayne is in the immediate vicinity of the "divide"—the line whence flow to the northeast the waters of the Maumee to the Lake—and those of the Wabash southwest to the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. By the course of these two rivers, the Maumee and the Wabash, nature has marked out for man the true route for this contemplated improvement. It will pass through five counties in the State of Ohio and seven counties in the State of Indiana, and if we add to these twelve only the counties adjoining them in both States as being directly interested in this improvement, we have thirty-three rich and populous counties, forming an area almost equal to the average of the States forming this Union. This large extent of country thus to be benefited, with its present and rapidly increasing population and development, gives to this contemplated canal a national character and importance deserving of national recognition and encouragement. It will form a most important part of the general system of water communication and transportation which is now claiming public attention, and will soon demand Government aid, liberally bestowed, in adapting it to the rapidly increasing agricultural and commercial interests of the great Mississippi Valley. Not alone to that valley, for it will be a connecting link between the waters flowing to the Gulf of Mexico and those flowing to the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, giving to the surplus productions of the large and fertile valleys of the Wabash and Maumee the advantages of both a northern and southern market.

The friends of this measure present no chimerical scheme. They are not indulging in a mere Utopian dream; they have faith in its practicability, a faith founded upon reason and the fitness of things. It has the hearty support of practical business men; of merchants, manufacturers, and agriculturists, and of experienced and intelligent civil engineers, all of whom have given the matter much thought and whose best judgment favors the undertaking. We ask in its behalf the friendly aid of the National Government; and as no one State or single locality is alone to be benefited by the work, so no State or particular locality should be called upon or would have the ability from its own resources to undertake a work of such magnitude. Its beneficent results would to a great extent be felt by the entire nation; and hence the nation should undertake its construction. It is too late to entertain or express doubts as to the power or the ability of the National Government to do this work; and in no more substantial and enduring manner can the aid of the Government be given to the people than in the construction of works of internal improvement like the one under consideration. The first step to be taken is to gather information as to the practicability of the work and its commercial importance when completed; and this can best be done by a complete survey conducted under the auspices of the Government; and from the report of such survey, such gathering of facts and statistics, the public mind can judge for itself whether it would be the part of wisdom to embark in the enterprise. We submit that this much is due to the opinions and judgment of the thousands of our citizens immediately interested and who have asked this at our hands. I trust therefore that during our present session a sufficient appropriation may be voted to enable the Government by actual survey to collect and report to us at a subsequent session the data upon which alone a correct judgment may be formed for our future action.

In close connection, and as part of the scheme already foreshadowed, is the further improvement of the Wabash River, whose navigable waters are reached at Lafayette, the southern terminus of the proposed water-route from Toledo, and for which improvement an appropriation will doubtless be made during this session of Congress. Forty years ago, before the era of railroads, the entire transportation of this rich valley was upon its waters. Merchandise of all descriptions, from Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, and Louisville, and groceries from New Orleans, for the various points on its banks in the States of Indiana and Illinois, thus reached their destination, and this river, too, was then the only outlet for the various agricultural productions of the valley seeking a market. The Wabash then presented a busy scene of trade and commerce, and this, by judicious legislation, can be made to reappear with largely increased and constantly increasing proportions. The building of railroads, the neglect of river improvements by the National Government, and the consequent and inevitable increase of the danger of navigation, resulting from such neglect, forced the trade into other channels. The rapidly increasing settlements in the Wabash Valley since that period, and its equally rapid increase of agricultural productions, now demand additional facilities for reaching a market. The railroads crossing this valley in all directions, besides furnishing a most expensive and almost ruinous mode of transportation, are unable to furnish sufficient transportation for the growing wants of the people.

With the construction of a canal or channel of sufficient dimensions to accommodate the trade of the Wabash and Maumee Valleys from Lafayette to Toledo you open up an avenue of transportation leading to both a northern and southern market for an amount of farm products which in the not distant future will require means of transportation far beyond that which can be furnished by any present or prospective railroad facilities. The improvement of the navigation of the Wabash from Lafayette to its mouth follows as a necessary part of this contemplated project, in order to give an outlet to such productions as may seek a southern market or a transit to and across the ocean by way of the Mississippi River, whose permanent improvement has, as I trust, become a part of the settled policy of the Government, and especially so since the removal of its bars at the Gulf seems to be an accomplished fact.

In point of dollars and cents as compared with the importance and value of commerce attracted to its waters, the cost of improving the Wabash River would be a mere bagatelle. The main thing required to furnish steamboat navigation for a large portion of the year would be the removal of sand-bars usually formed at the mouths of its tributaries. When these bars are once removed and a channel formed, it would be kept open by the passage of boats or at most but a slight annual expenditure would be required to prevent their subsequent formation. Such an improvement would give six months of uninterrupted navigation to the Wabash and create an impetus to commerce and production almost beyond the anticipations of the most sanguine. The broad acres of this matchless valley would teem with an energetic and industrious people, laboring with hope, because cheap transportation will secure to them the fruits of their daily toil.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, on the 20th day of February last I introduced into this House and had referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, where it is now pending, the following bill:

A bill to place certain articles imported and used in the manufacture of paper, and unsized printing-paper used exclusively for newspapers, pamphlets, and magazines, on the free list.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1880, all unsized printing-paper used exclusively for newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and books, and all soda-ash and impure carbonate of soda imported, to be used in the manufacture of paper, shall be admitted free of duty.

SEC. 2. All acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

I avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to call the attention of the House to the provisions of this bill, and to urge its passage. I regard it as an important measure, not only to publishers, but to all classes of our people. It is a fact known to us all, sir, that within a few months past there has been an unprecedented advance in the price of the materials mentioned in the bill. Upon printing-paper the advance has been nearly 60 per cent., and enormously large upon the raw materials entering into the manufacture of paper. This advance cannot be the result of natural laws, cannot be the result of the ordinary laws of supply and demand. Mr. Chairman, but for the vicious principle of protection underlying our commercial system the sudden fluctuations in the price of these articles would be impossible. They are the inevitable result of the falsely called "American system," which seeks to foster one branch of industry at the expense of all others. The discussion upon this measure will not have been wholly in vain if it but has the effect of calling the attention of the country to some of the iniquities of our tariff legislation. More exciting topics have unfortunately been permitted to engross public attention, but I trust the day is not far distant when the question of tariff reform, of such vital interest to our people, will receive the attention to which it is so justly entitled.

As I have suggested, Mr. Chairman, in the ordinary course of trade, such a sudden advance in the price of the articles mentioned in this bill would be impossible. The cause must be looked for elsewhere. The only explanation, sir, lies in the fact that combinations have been formed by manufacturers for the purpose of realizing enormous profits out of the manufacture of these articles. With competition cut off, "protected" by law, the manufacturers are enabled to effect combinations, securing a rapid rise in prices, to the end that they may be enriched and the people plundered. Can any reason be assigned for the increase of nearly 60 per cent. upon the price of paper within a few months? The fact that a combination has been entered into by paper manufacturers to double their profits at the cost of the consumer affords the correct, the only explanation. By our tariff laws, under the guise of "protecting American industry," we create and foster monopolies.

What is the pretext upon the part of the manufacturers for this advance? The only one assigned is the increased price of the raw materials entering into the manufacture of paper, resulting from the high duties imposed upon such materials. A sufficient answer to this is to be found in the fact that upon the articles mentioned the tariff has undergone no change for years. The increased price of paper is in no sense the result of the cause assigned by the manufacturers; it is to be found only in the combinations designed to affect the price.

But, sir, if the reason assigned by the manufacturers be indeed the true one, then by the passage of this bill the cause will be removed by placing the raw materials used in the manufacture of paper upon the free list. Let it be borne in mind that while the passage of this bill will relieve an important business industry from the burdens resulting from monopoly, it will in no considerable degree affect the revenues of the Government. It will be remembered that the tariff upon the larger portion of the articles mentioned in the bill is simply prohibitory. A protective tariff is necessarily prohibitory. To adequately "protect," it is indispensable that competition in trade should be prohibited.

I will be pardoned, Mr. Chairman, for calling the attention of the House to the views expressed by some of the leading public journals upon this question. This feeling is but an earnest of that which will be aroused throughout the country when the glaring injustice and robbery of our tariff system is properly understood.

The Journal, a leading paper of Ohio, in a recent issue, says:

The heavy and unprecedented advance in paper is, in our opinion, wholly unnecessary and unjustifiable. It injuriously affects almost every person in the country of the age of ten years and upward, and it is oppressive to publishers, and especially to publishers of newspapers. Already some of the leading newspapers of the country have been compelled to advance the price of their publications; and if the price of printing-paper continues to advance, or even if it remains at its present price, nearly all of the weekly papers of the country will be compelled, in self-defense, to put up the rates of subscription.

This is a general and almost universal grievance, and an unnecessary grievance at that. Congress can remedy it in less than two weeks. A joint resolution suspending indefinitely the duties on raw materials entering into the manufacture of paper should be passed by Congress. That will test the sincerity of the professions of American manufacturers. And if this should not have the effect to reduce the price of paper within reasonable limits, then let another resolution be passed suspending the duty on foreign paper.

We have always been and are now in favor of giving the preference to American manufacturers; but when men deliberately combine to take advantage of our practically prohibitory paper tariff, and to thereby amass fortunes at the expense of the publishing interest and the reading public, we hold that a time has arrived when relief should be asked in such a tone as will command the attention of our national legislators.

In a late issue the Chicago Tribune, in discussing the advance in paper, says:

Ninety to 95 per cent. of the "raw material" of news print used in the West consists of straw or basswood pulp, and we had not heard of any particular failure of the grain crop last season to occasion a "scarcity" of straw, nor has basswood visibly become scarce or dear. That excuse for the action of the paper combination won't wash any more than the nonsensical one of a "great increase in the demand for paper," which is simply untrue.

The New York Journal of Commerce of February 20 says:

The American press is almost but unanimous in demanding the abolition or decided reduction of the duty on foreign printing-paper. Protectionist and free-trade journals for once agree in this. The common misfortune of high-priced paper made them comrades if not friends. To this unanimity the Cincinnati Gazette is the only remarkable exception. That paper opposes the relief that would be so welcome to its contemporaries. It would still prohibit the importation of paper by retaining the tariff rate designed for that purpose, though it does concede the expediency of abolishing or reducing the duty on paper-manufacturing ingredients and chemicals.

The leading organ of the South, the Courier-Journal, of Louisville, Kentucky, says:

It is perfectly apparent that the paper-makers have no earthly excuse for raising the price of print papers 70 per cent., except that they want to make more money. To gratify their greed for gain they are levying, under the sheer pretense of "protecting American industry," an enormous tax on book and newspaper pub-fishers, which is in effect a tax on knowledge and an obstruction to its acquisition. This is one of the manifold barbarities of the protection system, and to call it a barbarous system is to use a very mild term. We say, Let this fight against rings of this kind be waged to the bitter end. That protective tariff has too long proven a hindrance to American prosperity, and the whole high-tariff system must go.

At a recent meeting of the newspaper publishers of New Orleans the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the Representatives of Louisiana in Congress be, and they are hereby, earnestly requested to use their influence to have the duty on printing-paper, chemicals, and materials used in the manufacture thereof removed or materially reduced.

In addition to these, Mr. Chairman, there is now pending before the General Assembly of the State of New York the following preamble and resolution for adoption:

Whereas a combination has been organized and does exist among the paper manufacturers of this country by which the price of printing-paper has been advanced some 40 per cent. without any just reason: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to vote in favor of the passage of the bill now pending to remove the duty on paper imported into this country to be used in printing books and newspapers.

Now, sir, the extracts and resolutions I have read, and to which many hundreds of others of like import might be added, indicate in unmistakable terms the deep feeling existing upon this subject. It is idle to suppose that the book and newspaper publishers alone are affected by the combinations to which I have referred. The burdens resulting from these combinations must of necessity eventually fall upon the shoulders of the people. In this as in all other cases where monopolies are encouraged by a prohibitory tariff, the consumer is the sufferer. The effect of such combination is to impair and in many cases to cripple an important—in fact, one of the most important of our business enterprises. It has, sir, appropriately been called “a tax on knowledge.” Upon the country press it is peculiarly oppressive. It is with the greatest difficulty that the publication of many of our weekly newspapers is continued under the burdens resulting from this monopoly. Publication must at once be suspended or the cost of material met by increasing the price of subscription. The latter course, even when practicable, but illy compensates for the additional outlay by the publisher.

The tax imposed by this prohibitory tariff upon the publisher eventually falls upon the reader. In this we see the “beauties of protection.” The great curse of a protective tariff, Mr. Chairman, is that by cutting off competition it makes such combinations against the people possible. It is through the instrumentality of the country press that the masses of our people, far removed from the great centers of population, receive their information. To them their weekly newspaper is a welcome, an indispensable visitor. Sir, the channels of intelligence to the people should be unobstructed. Whoever seeks to lessen the facilities for “the diffusion of useful knowledge among mankind,” to cut off the primer or periodical from the hearth-stone of cottage or hovel, is a public enemy.

Upon the intelligence of the people rest our hope for the preservation of republican government. If the people are educated, intelligent, virtuous, then is our Government safely anchored. To the end, Mr. Chairman, that the channels through which light and knowledge reach the people may be broadened rather than narrowed, I urge upon the House the passage of this bill.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, a single word as to two other bills now pending: the one introduced by my colleague, [Mr. MORRISON,] reducing the duty upon sugar; the other by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MCKENZIE,] placing salt upon the free list. It is impossible to overestimate the importance of these measures. The tariff upon these necessities of life should be removed at once and forever.

If this Congress, sir, will but pass the three bills to which I have referred, it will have taken an advance step on the line of true reform, and will entitle itself to the gratitude of a tax-burdened people.

Mr. HAWK. Mr. Chairman, upon careful examination of the bill under consideration we believe its provisions are wholesome and its tendency toward economy.

Our national finances being at the present in a most satisfactory condition it would appear to be the part of wisdom to take every possible advantage of our prosperous condition in our coming funding operations. It will be found by an examination of the late report of the Secretary of the Treasury that, from December, 1880, to July, 1881, inclusive, we have maturing the following amount of debt for which provision must be made, namely:

Maturing December 31, 1880, at 6 per cent. interest.....	$18,415,000
Maturing June 30, 1881, at 6 per cent. interest.....	254,392,550
Maturing July 1, 1881, at 6 per cent. interest.....	823,800
Maturing May 1, 1881, at 5 per cent. interest.....	508,440,350
Total.....	782,071,700

By careful computation of the interest upon this sum at the given rates it will be found to average 5.35 per cent. The bill under consideration proposes to fund the foregoing indebtedness by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds in an amount not exceeding \$500,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, redeemable, at the pleasure of the United States, after twenty years, and payable forty years from the date of issue; and also notes in the amount of \$200,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after two years, and payable in ten years from the date of issue; but prohibits the redemption in any one fiscal year of more than \$40,000,000. It will thus be seen that the saving to the Government will be the difference between 5.35 per cent. (the present average rate) and 3.50 per cent., the proposed rate per cent. of the new bonds and notes, which would be 1.85 per cent., or \$14,468,326.45 per annum—an amount of saving quite sufficient to enlist the earnest efforts of Congress. It is believed that the option of the Government in this arrangement is quite sufficient, and under it no oppression is likely to come to our resources or business interests.

I am not of those, Mr. Chairman, who believe in the policy of a low rate per cent. on an interminable bond something after the English plan. Should the present bill become a law, then, as compared with the English debt, our rates of interest are certainly very satisfactory. Governments, like individuals, should arrange to pay their debts as rapidly as their resources permit. The English system is mentioned as worthy of precedent; but it is submitted that our Government and that of England, although organized alike for the protection of the citizen in his rights, have many points of difference. In fact, in this country each citizen whether high or low is entitled to the same consideration before the law. The people constitute the government, and before this tribunal alone will an appeal lie. No other power is supreme; no co-ordinate courts or forces can claim any rights whatever in the presence of this august body of sovereigns—this court of final appeal in all departments of our Government. No question as to the “divine right of kings” or special privileges of the peerage can intervene in the decision of questions of public policy here. The independent citizen-creditor has a right to expect the payment of the debts of his Government the same as from a just and honest individual with whom a contract has been made. We must not thus early in our national history, with our immense resources at command and our comparatively light debt upon us, attempt to interminably perpetuate it for any purpose whatever.

I believe it to be a wise policy to retain to the Government a liberal option; and the provisions of this bill are thought to be ample in this respect. Care should be observed that no more rapid payment of the debt should be permitted than the commercial and general business interests of the country appear to justify. It is believed that payment should be made as rapidly as possible without overtaxation.

We have referred to our indebtedness as comparatively light, and that we may in this statement be the better understood we herewith present a table showing the indebtedness of France and England in comparison with that of the United States. The compilation is taken from the latest obtainable information upon the subject and is as follows:

France.....	$4,695,600,000 00
Great Britain and Ireland.....	3,888,907,980 00
United States, (March 1, 1880).....	1,995,112,221 17

It will thus be seen that our debt is not burdensome in comparison with that of the other nations mentioned. While our resources are fully one-third of the whole, our debt is only a little more than one-sixth of the aggregate of the three. It may be of interest to note the debt per head in these countries. It is as follows:

France.....	$127 23
Great Britain and Ireland.....	114 62
United States, (at 46,000,000 population).....	43 50

By the foregoing it will be seen that with our national debt in such satisfactory condition and our ever-increasing resources, we cannot justify authorizing the issue of an interminable bond; there is no necessity for such a step.

It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to discuss at great length our funding operations. Much valuable information will be presented to the country upon this subject during the continuance of this debate. I shall confine my remarks more especially to a general examination of our national finances, and to recommendations and suggestions from various sources upon our financial system, and hope thus to be able to assure and encourage the country in its commendable determination to keep good the promises made in the dark hours of its peril by the honest payment of the debt created for its preservation. In the prosecution of funding our debt the greatest care should be preserved that no taint of bad faith cause the least surmise of repudiation in any manner whatever, directly or indirectly. Nations, like individuals, in order to prosper, must be strictly honest. If our splendid fabric survive the storm of the coming centuries it must be strong in its determination to stand firmly by its promises. It was hoped the discussion of the national finances had subsided until a few weeks since the country was freely treated to the peculiar views and opinions of several honorable members of the House upon this subject. Judging by some of the arguments and theories presented by gentlemen upon this floor it would be a fair inference that much of our political history has been written in vain, especially that portion which relates to fixing some rule of action by which our reputation for national honesty and integrity is to be kept intact. It is not, however, our purpose to discuss these questions from the stand-point of what has been said by members of Congress at this session. We desire to call the attention of Congress and the country to some of the recommendations of the present Administration with reference to our finances.

At the opening of the present session of Congress we were startled by the recommendations contained in the annual report of our heretofore sagacious Secretary of the Treasury, and more especially by the following recommendations and suggestions to Congress contained in the President's late message, to wit:

I would, however, strongly urge upon Congress the importance of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the coinage of silver dollars upon the present legal ratio. The market value of the silver dollar being uniformly and largely less than the market value of the gold dollar, it is obviously impracticable to maintain them at par with each other if both are coined without limit. If the cheaper coin is forced into circulation it will, if coined without limitation, soon become the sole standard of value, and thus defeat the desired object, which is a currency of both gold and silver, which shall be of equivalent value, dollar for dollar, with the universally recognized money of the world.

The retirement from circulation of United States notes, with the capacity of legal tender in private contracts, is a step to be taken in our progress toward a safe and stable currency, which should be accepted as the policy and duty of the Government and the interest and security of the people. It is my firm conviction that the issue of legal-tender paper money based wholly upon the authority and credit of the Government, except in extreme emergency, is without warrant in the Constitution and a violation of sound financial principles. The issue of United States notes during the late civil war with the capacity of legal tender between private individuals was not authorized except as a means of rescuing the country from imminent peril. The circulation of these notes as paper money for any protracted period of time after the accomplishment of this purpose was not contemplated by the framers of the law under which they were issued. They anticipated the redemption and withdrawal of these notes at the earliest practicable period consistent with the attainment of the object for which they were provided.

The people of the country feel alarmed and annoyed at the unlooked-for reopening of this perplexing question. The great mass of our business men and those engaged in manufacturing regret that at the present, when all our material interests are just beginning to feel the touch of new life, called into existence by the abundance of our crops and production of every kind and the, for us, fortunate foreign demand for our surplus, this subject should, through the suggestion of congressional legislation, be again precipitated, with all its accompanying feelings of uncertainty, upon the country. We believe it to be a safe policy to cease the agitation of this question, and thereby prevent the feverish, unsettled feeling that must unavoidably grow out of any proposed change in existing laws.

We have now a most convenient and satisfactory currency, at par for all practical purposes with the circulation of the civilized world, and of uniform value in our local commercial transactions. This being the case any effort to make it better would appear a work of supererogation. It is urged in that portion of the message just quoted that it would be sound policy for Congress to "authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the coinage of silver dollars upon the present legal ratio," the minimum being $2,000,000 per month. A reason for this suspension of the coinage is given "that the market value of the silver dollar is uniformly and largely less than the market value of the gold dollar;" hence it is argued it will be impossible to maintain the circulation of the two metals at one and the same time. This, it is claimed, is a most fatal defect in our financial system, and indeed it appears to be such, in theory at least. To correct this discrepancy in the value of the coins of the two precious metals two principal plans have been suggested and ably argued by the special champions of each. The one advocates the stoppage entirely of the coinage of the silver dollar, and the other proposes an increase in the value of such dollar by adding an amount of metal sufficient to make it equal in value with the gold dollar.

We desire, Mr. Chairman, to examine this question from another stand-point and present a few thoughts differing, in some degree at least, from either of the suggestions made with reference to it. An examination of the recent report of the Director of the Mint to the Secretary of the Treasury reveals the fact that the purchasing power of gold has advanced 16.2, while that of silver has declined but 2.1 since 1870. We quote as follows from the report of the Director:

The results of a comparison of the price of each article in subsequent years with its price in 1870, added and averaged for each year, afford an indication of the general rise or fall of prices; that is, the purchasing power of money in this country for each of the ten years:

Fiscal years ending—	Comparative purchasing value of gold with its like value in 1869-70, as measured by the prices of United States exports.	Comparative purchasing value of silver.
1870.....	$1 00	$1 00
1871.....	95.5	95.7
1872.....	95.4	96.15
1873.....	93.8	92.8
1874.....	91.7	89.1
1875.....	99.8	94.8
1876.....	1 08.2	98.2
1877.....	1 06.3	95.7
1878.....	1 12.7	1 00.0
1879.....	1 16.2	97.9

For the purpose of testing fully and carefully the figures of the foregoing statement, we give below a further statement from the report of the Director, compiled from tables of prices in Europe. It is as follows:

Similar tables of prices in Europe, combined with those of American exports, show the following comparative purchasing power of gold and silver for the last ten years:

Years.	Purchasing value (measured by commodities) of—
	Gold.	Silver.
1870.....	$100	$100
1871.....	97.9	98.9
1872.....	95.4	95.3
1873.....	94	92.9
1874.....	95.6	92.9

In view of the foregoing the question is forcibly presented whether it would not be wise, should a change be thought advisable in existing laws, to adopt some plan for bringing the purchasing power of gold down to that of silver, inasmuch as silver has been, as shown by the statements just quoted, for many years the more stable of the two metals, its depreciation only showing the trifling amount of from 2.1 to 2.9, while, as will be seen, the advance fluctuation in gold is shown to be from 15.3 to 16.2 during the last decade.

The question is, shall the dollar of the more stable character be brought up to the one of the greater fluctuation, or, on the contrary, shall the one showing the greater range of difference in value be brought down to the more stable standard? It would be the part of fair dealing and statesmanship to decide the matter in a candid, honest, business-like manner, and this admits of but one answer to the question: the metal of the lesser variation should certainly remain, and the other be brought to it, in case it is deemed best to re-adjust values in our circulating medium. We deprecate the necessity of reference to this matter in toto; but since the discussion is presented to the country, it becomes our duty as legislators to divest our minds of all prejudice and approach the consideration of the subject with a desire for the accomplishment of the greatest permanent good.

The bringing the value of the gold dollar down to its purchasing power in 1870 would appear to be eminently just in case it be deemed best to bring the metals to something near an equal valuation by legislation, and would work far less injury to the business interests of the country than to bring the silver dollar up to the gold value, either by increasing the amount of metal in such dollar by demonetization or further limitation and restriction of the coinage. It is very difficult to determine how or where this leveling-down process could possibly affect the business interests of the country in the least. Our coins are measured in foreign commercial transactions by their bullion value largely, if not entirely; hence our foreign trade could in no sense be unfavorably affected. The question of recoinage of either of the metals is one that involves many delicate points of adjustment, and chiefly influences domestic trade and commerce.

It could not certainly affect anything unfavorably except it be existing contracts, and those only in remote or limited degree unless, indeed, in recoinage, it should be deemed necessary to increase the amount of bullion in the coins, thus adding to their value by enhancing their purchasing power, and making it more difficult to procure them for the payment of debts. This would be a clear case of discrimination against the debtor classes. It might be answered that legislation favoring the debtor would certainly discriminate against the creditor, a power no more to be assumed by the Legislature than that of favoring any other class in any of the various fields of legislation.

We doubt very much, Mr. Chairman, the wisdom of any change at this time in existing laws upon this subject, but should it be deemed best to make changes, this would appear to be a most opportune time for a "leveling down" to the extent of bringing the coinage of the country to near the same value, in view of the rapid advance in the purchasing power of gold since much of the indebtedness, public and private, has been created.

The ability to sustain, practically, a bimetallic currency is not so difficult. The proposition that with a difference in value in the coins of the precious metals it is utterly impossible to maintain a bimetallic currency being true, then can only monometallic circulation be sustained, for the reason that was the value of the two dollars, gold and silver, now so arranged as to be equal, it would be an utter impossibility to keep it so, critically considered, (for this question must be considered upon some fixed principle,) because any small percentage of difference in value, from whatever cause, of sufficient amount to justify transporting or hoarding either metal after a new coinage adjustment would cause the more valuable to disappear, thus necessitating new coinage for the purpose of again readjusting values in order to prevent practically a monometallic currency; nor, indeed, is it possible to foresee the end of this recoinage policy for readjustment of values. Usually the fluctuations in the comparative values of the metals are so gradual that contracts are not materially affected; and this is one of the strong points in favor of permitting trade and business interests generally to adjust themselves to currency conditions so far as variations in value are concerned. It is believed that far less disturbance would be produced by such a course than in case of the changes being brought about by arbitrary enactment.

It would indeed be difficult to predict that in case of a recoinage of the silver dollar which should contain an increase of bullion it might not from various causes, within a few years or months, become so valuable as to be bought up for exportation, and in this way force quite as much as in present conditions monometallism upon the country.

Mr. Chairman, this is certainly an eminently proper time to let the agitation of these questions severely alone. The logic of events will solve this coinage problem more effectually and satisfactorily than is possible by legislative enactment. It is more than probable that the old ratio between the two metals of from 15½ or 16 to 1 is as nearly correct as could be arranged by an international congress upon this subject. This having been established as the relative values of these two metals by long usage and the requirements of internecine traffic, it would certainly be wise not to disturb it except for most potent reasons. Practical experience is a powerful factor in the solution of all these intricate problems, and the statesman should bow to old naturally established usages with reverence.

I certainly do not wish to be understood as opposing an international conference upon this subject of readjustment of values; but it is very desirable that caution, moderation, and candor be carefully observed in the consideration of this important question. Nor do we deem it wise to increase or diminish the present volume of silver coinage. Two millions per month will give us but twenty-four millions per year—one hundred and twenty millions in five years, and two hundred and forty millions in ten years—certainly not an exorbitant amount; and it is reasonable to suppose that the legitimate and proper use of this metal will tend to its rapid appreciation in value. Should it be urged that silver is too cumbersome a metal with which to transact the business of the country, we answer that we do not use the metals, either gold or silver, in our commercial trafficking to great extent, except in the smaller transactions. They are chiefly valuable as substantial, available, rapidly convertible reserves upon which to base commercial transactions and against which to draw checks and drafts. It is submitted whether silver for the purposes enumerated is not a most excellent and substantial foundation upon which to base credit, whether of the citizen or nation.

It is said silver does not circulate; that it is left in the vaults of the Treasury, and the people do not want it. We answer that the same conditions apply to gold and its use as a medium of exchange. Yet no one will doubt the necessity of having a rapidly and readily convertible commodity upon which may be based checks and certificates with which to transact the business of the country; neither will any person question the peculiar adaptability of the precious metals to this necessary purpose. Private contracts can be made for payment in either or both metals, and neither debtor nor creditor suffer in the least; but when no stipulation is made, let all understand that either or their equivalent may be used.

If haste can be made very slowly in the consideration of this question, we feel assured that nothing can be lost in trusting to the logic of events for a full, complete, and satisfactory settlement of coinage differences.

The message referred to contains a recommendation to Congress for legislation favoring "the retirement of the circulation of United States notes with the capacity of legal tender in private contracts" as "a step to be taken in our progress toward a safe and stable currency, which should be accepted as the policy and duty of the Government, and the interest and security of the people."

Mr. Chairman, we utterly fail to understand that there is the least necessity for this retirement of our greenbacks. Certainly no evil effects are perceptible at present in our business conditions from the presence of this circulation; and in our judgment no good and sufficient reason has been presented for its retirement, nor do we know of any that would warrant in the slightest this action at the present. As a compromise, it has been suggested that it is desirable that the greenback be stripped of its legal-tender quality; that could this be done our system would be greatly benefited. It is argued that taking away the legal-tender capacity of the greenback currency would not affect its value. This proposition is, however, hard to understand. Its chief value consists in constituting a circulating medium performing all the functions of money, with a debt-paying power equal with the precious metals, and in addition to this admirable and useful function it provides a substitute for gold and silver to the national banks for the redemption of their notes, for which purpose, if stripped of its legal-tender powers, it could not be used, and there must of necessity spring up an extra demand upon the precious metals. It is always safe to have more than one resource, or even two, at command in an emergency. Let there come a panic from any cause whatever with a purely gold currency, and it at once disappears. It would not be so easy to hoard both gold and silver in case of such a condition of affairs; and it would be still more difficult to lock up with them a full legal-tender paper currency. With these three performing the full functions of money, it does not require a financier to perceive the immense advantage to be derived from this treble standard in place of a single one when a stringency in the money market is imminent.

We, then, have the greenback currency with its legal-tender qualities unimpaired performing important offices in our financial system.

First. It aids the Government in the resumption of specie payment by preventing a run of the national banks for specie in case of panic.

Second. It adds to the debt-paying ability of the country, public and private, by preventing the hoarding of legal-tender, debt-paying money of the people by the few, who may in case of panic hold their capital uninvested in agricultural, manufacturing, or other pursuits for the development of the resources of the country, but who see to it that their means are held well in hand for the purpose of profiting by the necessities of these pursuits.

Third. It may be used in all transactions and for all purposes for which metallic money is used as a circulating medium, and being limited in amount it can easily be maintained at par with the precious metals, and is much more convenient for the ordinary purposes of traffic. Neither has there at any time been the least lack of confidence among the people in the stability and usefulness of this currency for all their necessary requirements.

Here, then, we have use, stability, (because of easy convertibility,) multiplicity of resource in case of emergency, and the unbounded confidence of the people in its present condition, all in favor of its powers being continued. It is submitted that it is difficult to imagine a greater array of argument in its favor. True it was originally issued under the extreme demands of dire necessity, while the national life was in imminent peril; but this is no argument if the people are satisfied with it that its benefits may not be continued to them in times of peace, especially if well guarded from overissue. Then, where is the necessity of this currency, performing all the functions of money and really of great benefit to the country, as we have seen, being shorn of a portion—and we do not know but entirely—of its power? For we can but believe this is the first step in the programme for its final retirement.

Where the danger of permitting the present conditions to remain until there appears to be some necessity for changing existing laws upon the subject? There certainly can be no cause for alarm at the present. It is urged in a clause of the message just quoted that this kind of circulation is not warranted by the Constitution. We answer, it will be quite time enough to think of retiring this valuable accession to the strength of our financial system when this question shall have been passed upon by a judicial tribunal of competent jurisdiction. Let us not mar or destroy this splendid financial fabric with which we are so well satisfied until we shall have learned by some practical test or theory of government that another can be erected which shall be more satisfactory, or that the present arrangement is dangerous to our happiness and perpetuity.

There is another phase of this financial discussion that may be properly considered in this connection, and this is our national-banking system. It has come to be a necessity to this country that there be maintained, for the purposes of effecting exchanges, some system of banking. Ninety per cent. of the business of the country is done by checks and drafts on balances. Our national-banking system was organized in 1863, and by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, December, 1879, we find that the number of banks organized and in operation in June, 1879, was 2,048, with a capital in round numbers of $455,000,000 and deposits of over $713,000,000.

Up to 1863 the business of the country was done by banks organized under State laws upon State and other stocks, much of which was of a precarious character. By the State laws under which these banks were organized they were made banks of issue, and a very great proportion of these issues were made with not even the nominal support of the precarious stocks mentioned. Each State Legislature enacted the necessary laws for the government and control of these banks as to their issues and other powers, and as a consequence there was no uniformity in either the volume or value of the paper circulation. Our exchanges were effected with great difficulty, and in fact with much loss to portions of the country, owing to the difference in value of the issues of the banks operating under these different State laws. The great volume of traffic between the rapidly developing West and the eastern seaboard cities, then as now necessitated a vast amount of exchange in the transaction of business between the sections; and did the same discrepancy exist now as was sometimes the case then, before the inauguration and perfection of our present admirable system, the tax upon our western production would be a burden to which the people would not submit. It will be remembered that under the old ante bellum State system the difference between the value of the circulation of our western and seaboard States was at times as great as from 15 to 20 per cent., and the western merchant, forced to submit to this difference, had as a matter of self-preservation to add this to the price of his purchases, thus taxing the western consumer to a vastly greater extent in maintaining the old State system than has ever been the case under our present plan. The foregoing was not, however, the chief objection to this old democratic plan of banking, although this was so obviously wrong, viewed from our present enlightened position, that it is useless to think of the people again submitting to such wholesale robbery.

The insecurity of the bills of these State institutions in the hands of the people, caused by the precarious nature of the stocks upon which their issues were based, was the cause of great loss to the holders and created a panic in 1857 that almost paralyzed the whole business of the country, bringing trade and commerce to a sudden and disastrous stagnation. It is said that the panic of that year cost the State of Illinois alone $6,000,000. Surely, with the history of that trying period, and in fact the whole banking system prior to 1863, so fresh in the memory of the people, we do not care to try such an experiment again. The advantages of our national banking system as now organized are so markedly in contrast with those of the old State plan that there can certainly be no question as to which is the better. Nor do we believe it to be a wise policy to destroy our present arrangement unless a markedly better, more constitutional, and legal one can be substituted for the same. We have been calling the attention of the country to the old democratic manner of transacting business, that we may the more effectually show the wisdom of republican methods; and we think it not unreasonable that the people should be asked to compare the past with the present, and we appeal to them to be careful how they remand this important matter to the hands of those whose record is a standing monument of folly and lack of business sagacity. We submit that while the loss of the vast sums mentioned was a direct tax upon the people, no man ever lost a farthing by the national bank circulation, nor is it possible for any person to lose anything on account of the issues of these banks. The matter of difference, however, is whether the Government shall issue directly the paper circulation of the country, or shall such issue be made through banking corporations based upon the bonds of the Government as securities for such circulation.

During the year 1862 and 1863, while the war of the rebellion was at its height and the credit of the Government was being taxed to its utmost by the constant draft upon its resources, Congress, by acts of February 25 and July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863, authorized the issue of what was called legal-tender notes, the volume of which issue has fluctuated from time to time as the requirements of trade and commerce appeared to demand, and amounted on the 28th day of February, 1880, to the sum of $346,681,016. In the discussions in Congress at the time of the first issue of these legal-tender notes it was claimed that such an issue could only be justified by the most urgent necessity, and that such necessity was then upon the country no person for a moment doubted in the least. These issues have been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States as unconstitutional, but afterward constitutional and admissible, and allowable as a necessity and sustainable upon this theory. Waiving all questions as to the constitutionality of the power of Congress to authorize the issue of paper money in times of peace, a question concerning which there can be but one opinion, let us examine for a moment the proposition to supersede national-bank circulation with greenback issues. Should this be done we would be benefited to the extent of 4 per cent. on $342,210,867, the amount of the national-bank circulation January 31, 1880, provided an equal amount of interest-bearing bonds was called in and canceled. The amount of such interest would be $13,688,434.68. At 3½ per cent., as proposed by the bill under consideration, the amount would be $11,977,380.34. This sum is certainly of sufficient magnitude that it should be saved to the Government, and at first thought it appears that this amount would be clear gain to the Treasury. A candid view of the subject develops the fact that in taking out of existence this amount of national-bank circulation there is taken from the taxable property of the country the said sum of $342,210,867, and by so doing a greater burden must be added to the visible property of the people, and let us see what this tax amounts to in 1878, the last year for which we can find a compilation. It is as follows:

United States tax.....	$6,727,232
State and local tax.....	8,056,533
Total.....	14,783,765

It will certainly not be argued or maintained by any person that the Government can tax its own indebtedness. This proposition is so utterly preposterous that it needs no demonstration; and it is certainly unsafe to permit a State of the Union to do that which would ultimately destroy the Government by the final destruction of its credit. It is unquestionably true that our greenback issue is only an issue of certificates of Government indebtedness, which, by agreeing not to increase beyond a certain amount and by keeping a percentage of coin in reserve, is kept at par with the precious metals. This greenback issue must then, being no more nor less than an evidence of indebtedness of the Government, be non-taxable under all laws and decisions upon the subject. In the event of the retirement of the national-bank circulation and issuing Government notes in its place, we would relieve the country from interest to the amount of from $12,000,000 to $14,000,000, and add to the burdens of our industries a taxation of almost $15,000,000, by retiring the aforesaid amount, $342,210,867, of taxable capital and supplying in its stead an equal amount of non-taxable capital. It may be said these national banks pay no more than their proportion of tax with private banks. This may be true; but it is submitted that by retiring their circulation the interest upon their bonds would be assured without the taxation, while it must be plain that by continuing these banks in existence and making the bonds a basis upon which to issue bank-stock, they are indirectly made taxable. A further issue of paper circulation by the Government would also necessitate the hoarding in the Treasury, in coin, for redemption purposes of at least 33 per cent. of such issue; which, if the same be made to cover the present outstanding issue of the national banks, would amount to the sum of $114,070,289. This amount is the least that, according to the rules and experience of safe banking, would be necessary to maintain the aforementioned issue of paper at par and prevent our credit from becoming disastrously affected in the markets of the world. No statesman or party can afford in the least during times of peace and prosperity to enact or advocate laws affecting in any manner unfavorably the credit of the nation.

The necessity of maintaining the credit of the country untarnished cannot be too strongly presented or sacredly guarded, and must be particularly manifest when it is remembered that the Government is and must of necessity for years to come be engaged in funding its indebtedness as the same shall become due, and which it is impossible at the moment to discharge. Any decrease in value in our securities or increase in interest paid must finally come from the productive industries of the country. We claim for the republican party the honor of placing national credit upon such a basis as to enable the Government to borrow unlimited sums of money at an unprecedented low rate of interest.

We have, too, the spectacle of leading democrats upon the other side now advocating funding our obligations falling due in a short time at the very satisfactory rate of 3½ per cent. interest per annum, and this, too, in view of the loud protests of the democratic party by the enunciations of their platforms and orators—only a little more than a year ago, that the credit of the Government was not such as to warrant the presumption that it was possible to resume specie payments. Surely the world does move—when the Bourbon democracy, driven by the logic of events and the persistent patriotic efforts of the republican party, is now through its leaders upon this floor found advocating these low-funding projects as a result of specie resumption and as a consequence of the established credit of the nation.

It has been stated upon this floor that national banks are robbers of the people; that vast sums of money are made to their stockholders and, that they are crushing out the legitimate business of the country. This is hard to comprehend. If indeed these banks are so very profitable, why do not our people organize them more generally all over the country? The franchises of national banks do not constitute a monopoly. National banking is practically free; any five citizens or greater number may engage in this lucrative business, may organize one or more of these institutions provided always that they can procure the money with which to purchase the necessary Government bonds. It may be said it is difficult to get a sufficient amount of capital together to purchase the requisite bonds. It is submitted upon this point that the same argument applies in organizing any business requiring capital, such as merchandising or manufacturing. By organizing these banking associations all over the country almost every citizen could become a sharer in these lucrative institutions. A general investment in Government bonds and national-bank stocks would also increase the circulation of the country, and it is suggested that those of our friends who think there is lack of circulation could in this way very properly and legitimately, not to say philanthropically, increase the per capita circulation, add to the taxable property of the country, and at the same time become direct sharers in this lucrative business. The shares of these banking institutions are divided in such manner that any person may purchase them at about $100 each, thus placing the holding such stock within the reach of almost every person. Such increase of the circulation would be brought about upon a perfectly legitimate and safe basis, and without the slightest increase of the obligations of the Government, which, it must be borne in mind, would not be the case were greater volume of greenback issue resorted to; unless, as before stated, a corresponding amount of interest-bearing indebtedness should be immediately canceled.

It must not be forgotten that the only way by which an organized government can procure its necessary revenues is by the taxation of its people, and this is the only means for providing funds for the payment of its accumulated indebtedness as well as the payment of current expenses.

Governments are not, neither should they be, organized for the purpose of conducting mercantile, commercial, or other business for the purposes of profit. These are the special prerogatives of the citizen. The prime object of the banding together of communities under forms of government is not that they may organize for the purpose of concentrating the powers of commerce, traffic, and trade, but that the citizen may be the more secure in the enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property, the first great natural rights of man. As well argue that the Government being its own bank of issue, and the people being satisfied therewith, therefore the people would be as well satisfied with the manufactures of cloth, iron, or any other necessity of the country by the Government; hence, the people being content, the Government should do all the manufacturing and mercantile business of the country and take these also out of the hands of monopolies that are robbing the people by the accumulation of profits. It is, however, hardly presumable that any gentleman upon this floor, who has read history, would dare have the temerity to advocate this wholesale return to paternal government. It has been argued by some men of national reputation that governments can by the enactment of a law create value to their circulating medium. This, however, is not true. No argument is needed to disprove a proposition so manifestly absurd and unreasonable.

Could it be demonstrated that organized government can "flat" value into its issue, then it is submitted that the greater the issue the more value in the country, and the proposition would naturally follow that the issue of this value should be unlimited. But it is utterly useless to think of such an absurd theory. The only way by which the nation can pay its debts honestly is by taxing its people, and in this manner raise the money to pay them. It is submitted in this connection that any decrease in our reputation for national honesty and integrity must in the end affect our credit unfavorably and increase the burdens of the people.

I believe the consideration of financial measures should be divested of every other matter. No appeal should be made in any manner whatever to prejudices of any kind; no class of citizens should be appealed to as a class in order to force through any measure of a financial character without the most mature and deliberate consideration of the subject.

Ex-soldiers, as a class, have rights under the Government that must be sacredly guarded; but they must not be used by cunning, designing parties by permitting themselves and their interests to be dragged into and made a factor in the discussion of the national finances. By all means pay these gallant defenders of the nation in her hour of peril every cent to which they are entitled. Parcel out the public domain to them. Provide liberal pensions for the unfortunate, the widows and orphans of the nation's defenders; equalize their bounties as contemplated by the bill for that purpose introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY.] Provide homes for the wounded and unfortunate on a grand scale if need be, but do all this by direct grant and taxation, and not by dragging them and their interests into and complicating them with financial legislation in passage of which there is no hope and less necessity.

Mr. Chairman, these views and suggestions are presented with a full desire to do justice to the business interests of the country. I know these questions will enter somewhat into the discussions of the coming political campaign and I have thought best to present them to the House and country that the necessity may be made apparent of not tampering with existing laws upon the subject of our national finance. We have all the legislation necessary at present for the good of the business of the country, and any tampering with the finances will tend to disturb business and affect contracts unfavorably. The policy of letting "well enough alone" is the correct one, during the present session of Congress certainly, if not indeed for many sessions to come.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, in view of our splendid financial condition, it is wise and statesmanlike to at least make the effort to save to our Treasury all in our power. We believe the refunding bill now under consideration to be a measure the provisions of which are worth testing. No evil can result from it, and we may venture to hope that much good will accrue to the people. As a matter of sagacity the republican party should take advantage of the credit of the country produced by the management of its finances under its administration of affairs, and reap the rich harvest of reputation for honesty in the management of the national finances which it has in past years sown and to which it is justly and properly entitled.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, there are two opposing theories in reference to the effects produced by public debts. The adherents of one maintain that a public debt is a public blessing; that it is so much added to the national wealth; that it facilitates exchanges, stimulates trade, promotes agriculture, and encourages every species of industry; that it brings prosperity and power to a nation, and makes it independent and self-supporting in war as well as in peace. All these advantages, so incalculable in their value, flowing directly from a funded debt, it follows, as they maintain, that it should be the constant care of a wise statesmanship to preserve and perpetuate its existence to the remotest posterity.

The adherents of the opposing theory as stoutly maintain that a public debt is a public burden; that it is a cunningly devised scheme of the rich and powerful to enslave the masses for the greater and more rapid enlargement of their own fortunes; that through its influence the burdens of taxation are shifted from the shoulders of the wealthy to the shoulders of the poor, and in such manner as to transfer, under its deceitful disguises, the earnings of labor to the coffers of the wealthy; that it creates and supports a vast money power, whose existence is a constant menace to popular government; that it is the parent of national banks and indirect taxation; and that through their pernicious results the laboring population is continually rendered poorer, and a large portion of them reduced to pauperism and crime. Holding these opinions, duty to the people, whose welfare is imperiled, demands as they maintain, that its extinguishment should be as rapid and their deliverance as thorough and complete as the constitutional powers of Congress can make it.

What course, therefore, any of us shall take upon the bill reported by the committee to refund the debt falling due in the present and ensuing year, and to draw on posterity for its payment, will depend in a great measure upon the opinions that each may hold as to the wisdom of the one or the other of these two opposing theories.

National debts, wherever they exist, are the products of war. It is a singular fact that notwithstanding the vast monument of funded debt that rests to-day upon the shoulders of the civilized world, we search in vain on all the pages of ancient history for any traces of its existence. It is unknown to history anterior to the seventeenth century. When we remember that all history is one continued recital of deeds of arms, of marches and counter-marches, of victories and defeats, of blotting the maps and drawing anew the boundaries of empire, of tearing down and erecting dynasties—when we remember that man has been busy through all his existence in hunting down his fellow and slaying him as a sacrifice to propitiate the smiles of power, we are overwhelmed with wonder that it never entered into the mind of king, prince, potentate, or power to invoke to his aid this most powerful auxiliary. The knowledge of its wonderful power was concealed from man from the dawn of creation through all the darker ages, to be revealed in the blaze of the civilization of more modern times. To the statesmen and the philanthropists of these later years Heaven has reserved the priceless boon of conceiving the great idea and developing it into a powerful engine of fiscal administration. To them belongs all the glory and all the honor for having discovered and perfected this wonderful engine of state-craft that so rapidly, so noiselessly, so effectually, so remorselessly condemns without crime to unrequited toil the generation now living and all the generations that are to come from the womb of the future. [Applause.]

The wise men who founded and administered governments in the earlier ages of the world provided in times of peace for the expenditures of war. The Jews, Egyptians, Assyrians, Medes, Persians, Greeks, Romans, and all the peoples that followed them hoarded treasures in their national coffers in times of peace to be expended when the exigencies of war required it. Violent and reprehensible as were too often the methods practiced under their policy, yet it had one redeeming feature, wholly unknown to the funding system, it laid its exactions at the door of the opulent and powerful, while the funding system clandestinely, surreptitiously, stealthily lays all its crushing burden upon the shoulders of the weak and powerless.

A bonded public debt is a plant of vigorous growth. It flourishes in all countries and climes. We find it in all the governments of Europe, in Asia, in all the countries of South America, in Mexico, in every State of the American Union. In 1848 the public debts of the civilized world were $8,000,000,000. In 1870, only twenty-two years afterward, only the life of a generation, only a breath in the existence of a nation, the public debts of the civilized world had increased to $19,000,000,000. In this short space of time France increased her debt eighteen hundred millions, Italy twelve hundred millions, Austria nine hundred millions, Germany six hundred millions, Spain five hundred millions, and the United States twenty-eight hundred millions.
